Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, as soon as practicable, in person or through three commissioners to be appointed by him, to obtain and acquire for the United States of America, from the Red Lake Chippewa Indians, in the State of Minnesota, their cession and relinquishment, in writing, of all their title and interest in and to said Red Lake reservation, for the purposes and upon the terms hereinafter stated; and such cession and relinquishment shall be deemed sufficient if made by the chiefs or headmen of said tribe of Indians, in a public council or meeting of the band, and assented to by a majority of the male adults of said band present at such meeting; and the acceptance and approval of such cession and relinquishment by the Secretary of the Interior shall be deemed full and conclusive proof of the assent of said Red Lake Chippewa Indians to said cession and relinquishment.

SEC. 2. That as soon as the cession and relinquishment of said Indian title is obtained, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause so much of said reservation as is agricultural or pine lands to be surveyed as Government lands are surveyed; and in making such surveys the surveyor shall carefully ascertain and note and return on the plat and in the field-notes all forty-acre or lesser tracts on which there is any pine timber standing or growing, and which tracts are for the purposes of this act termed pine lands; and upon the completion of such surveys the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the stumpage upon each forty-acre or lesser tract of said pine lands to be estimated and appraised by three competent men to be appointed by him. Such stumpage shall be estimated by the thousand feet of broad-measure upon each separate tract of forty acres or less; and such appraisal shall be at the rate of a certain sum per thousand feet, and shall in no event be less than $1 per thousand feet.

SEC. 3. That after the said pine lands have been surveyed, and the stumpage thereon estimated and appraised as aforesaid, the Secretary of the Interior shall, after having given three months' notice through newspapers of general circulation published at Saint Paul, Duluth, and Crookston, in said States, through the United States land officers for the district where the lands are situate, offer for sale and sell, at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash in hand, in forty-acre or lesser tracts, the stumpage on said pine lands, with ten years' right of removal; but such sale shall not be for a less price than the appraised value, nor shall the stumpage on any tract be sold at a less price than $2 per acre, nor shall more than one-twentieth in acreage or quantity of timber of the stumpage of said pine lands be disposed of in any one year, or otherwise disposed of than in this act provided, nor shall the United States part with the fee-simple in said pine lands.

SEC. 4. That as soon as any of the lands on said reservation other than pine lands have been surveyed, the Secretary of the Interior shall give notice thereof, which said notice shall be published in at least ten of the principal papers published in the State of Minnesota, for the full term of sixty days from the date of said notice; and at the expiration of said sixty days the said land so surveyed, and no others, shall be disposed of by the United States to actual settlers only, under the provisions of existing homestead acts: Provided, That each settler, under and in accordance with the provisions of said homestead acts, shall pay to the United States for the land so taken by him the sum of 50 cents for each and every acre, in four equal annual payments, and shall be entitled to a patent therefor only at the expiration of four years from the date of entry, according to said homestead laws, and after the full payment of said 50 cents per acre therefor; and any conveyance of said lands so taken as a homestead, or any contract touching the same, or lien thereon, created prior to the date of such patent, shall be null and void: Provided, further, That settlers who have not had the benefit of the pre-emption laws shall be entitled to enter homesteads under the provisions of this act, notwithstanding they may previously have had the benefit of the homestead laws.

SEC. 5. That the funds arising from the sale of the stumpage of said pine lands, and the funds arising from homestead entries under this act, shall be disposed of as follows: Out of said funds shall first be paid all the expenses of the surveys, estimates, and appraisals herein prescribed, and the balance remaining of said funds shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States, and draw interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, which interest, and so much of the principal as the Secretary of the Interior may see fit, shall by him be expended for the benefit of said Indians, for such purposes, in such sums, and at such times, and in such manner as he may, in his discretion, from time to time determine.

SEC. 6. That the said Indians may continue to occupy said pine lands as a reservation, and use the dead and down timber thereon for fuel, until otherwise provided by law; but they are in no manner to interfere with or hinder the purchasers of stumpage in the full enjoyment of their stumpage right; it being the true intent and meaning of this act that the said Indians may continue to occupy and hold the said pine lands as hunting, fishing, and trapping grounds, and for haying and pasturage, until otherwise provided by law; but such occupancy and use to be without any prejudice or hinderance to the rights of purchasers of stumpage.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior shall, under such rules as he may determine, make allotments of said lands other than pine lands to the said Indians in severalty as follows: To each head of a family, one quarter-section; to each single person over 20 years of age, one-eighth of a section; to each orphan child under 20 years of age, one-eighth of a section; and to each other person now living, when he or she has attained the age of 20 years, one-eighth of a section; but such allotments shall be so made as to leave the allottees in a tract separate and distinct from and not intermingled with other settlers; and for the purposes of filling such allotments the Secretary of the Interior shall withhold from settlement and entry on the eastern or southeastern side of Red Lake, or elsewhere on said reservation if necessary, a quantity of land sufficient for such allotments; and for the allotments so made as herein provided certificates shall issue to the allottees, which certificates shall be of the legal effect and declare on their face that the United States does and will hold the land thus allotted for the period of thirty years in trust for the sole use and benefit of the allottee or his or her heirs, according to the laws of the State of Minnesota, and that at the expiration of said period the United States will convey by patent in fee-simple to the allottee, or his or her heirs as aforesaid, the land so allotted, discharged of said trust and free of all liens or incumbrances.

SEC. 8. That the provisions made for said Indians in this act shall be deemed and taken to be compensation in full for their cession and relinquishment of all their right and interest in said reservation to the United States of America, as herein contemplated: Provided, That except as to the cession and relinquishment and the survey of the lands as provided in this act, none of its provisions shall apply to the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each township so surveyed, or to the swamp lands on said reservation, but the same shall be reserved to the State of Minnesota in accordance with the acts of Congress heretofore passed in relation to such lands in said State: Provided further, That in case the Secretary of the Interior in making the allotments provided for in this act shall deem it necessary or proper to allot any parts or portions of said sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, or of said swamp lands to said Indians, he is hereby empowed so to do, and thereupon said State shall be entitled to select equivalents therefor.

Mr. NELSON. This bill as it was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs has been amended in several particulars at the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. To enable the gentleman to explain it fully I will ask for a second.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. NELSON. I desire, Mr. Speaker, as briefly as I can, to state the nature of this bill and the objects intended to be accomplished by it. In the northwestern part of the State of Minnesota, contiguous to the international boundary line, there is a large reservation of some three millions of acres of land in area. More than one-half of that reservation, the northern half of it, is marshy and swamp land, unfit for any purposes. In the southern half, however, there are about twenty townships of pine-timber lands, and the balance of the reservation in the Red River valley is prairie land.

This reservation is occupied at the present time by some 1,200 Indians, the remains of the Chippewa tribe. Their occupancy of this reservation is quite recent.

The object of the present bill is to extinguish the title of these Indians to the lands. In the first place it provides for obtaining their relinquishment of the same. It then provides that the reservation shall be surveyed and the lands upon which there is pine timber shall be so marked in the plats and in the field notes and designated as pine lands.

These pine lands are to be disposed of as follows: The stumpage is to be estimated and appraised by three commissioners, experts, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and the commission so appointed is to estimate the stumpage on every forty acres of land or the lesser subdivisions made by the Government. But in making their appraisement they are to do so at not less than $1 per thousand feet board-measure for the stumpage.

After the appraisement of the lands and upon public notice of ninety days, which notice is to be given in the leading papers as designated by the bill, the pine is to be sold at public sale and at not less than the appraisement and under no circumstances at less than $2 per acre. In order to prevent what has been the curse of that country before, it is stumpage alone that is to be sold under this arrangement and not the lands themselves.

Under prior and existing laws in Minnesota large quantities of the most valuable pine lands have been acquired by speculators and others, located and taken up by "half-breed" scrip, soldiers' additional, and all other kinds without benefit to the Government. But in this bill no scrip can be used for the location of any of these lands, for the reason that the timber only is sold, the lands remaining intact, and to be disposed of only as provided by the bill.

As to the agricultural lands, the bill provides that they shall be only taken under the homestead law. But there is one peculiarity about the provisions of this bill. Under the homestead law as it exists to-day settlers are only required to pay the fees of the land office, but here they are required to pay for the lands at the rate of 50 cents per acre in four equal annual installments.

This amendment was incorporated on the bill at the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and is a copy of what is known as the Dawes bill in the Senate, in reference to the great Sioux reservation in Dakota. The proceeds of all the pine and the proceeds of all the homestead lands at 50 cents per acre are to go as a trust fund to the Indians, to be deposited with the Secretary of the Interior and to draw interest at 3 per cent. per annum.

In addition to this, Mr. Speaker, the bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall make allotments in severalty to all the Indians, to heads of families, one hundred and sixty acres of the best lands that can be found on the reservation, and to all other Indians, no matter of what age, eighty acres each; and in addition to these farms allotted to the Indians they are to have permission to occupy the pine lands both before and after the stumpage.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, rose.

Mr. BLOUNT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. NELSON. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia for a question first and afterward to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know of the gentleman in charge of this bill what is the estimated amount of the fund he thinks under the operation of this law will go into this trust fund for the benefit of these Indians?

Mr. NELSON. I can not tell you that exactly. It can only be estimated approximately. It is assumed that there are about twenty townships of land that are covered with pine timber. I imagine under the bill that the pine lands will bring from five to ten dollars per acre for the stumpage. As to the residue of the lands, which are to be sold to actual homestead settlers only, the price is fixed at 50 cents per acre.

Mr. BLOUNT. You can not, then, give the amount?

Mr. NELSON. As I have said, I can only give the amount approximately; but whatever it is, all of the proceeds of the sales, after the expense of surveying, &c., will be turned into the Treasury and left there for the benefit of the Indians at 3 per cent. interest.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would ask the gentleman further how the Indians are subsisting at this time? What is their mode of living?

Mr. NELSON. At the present time they are only partially civilized, although they carry on a little farming. The report of the Indian Commissioner shows that they have about six hundred acres on the reservation in cultivation; and for the rest there is a large lake, Red Lake, on the reservation, and they live by hunting and fishing. They are mere nomads, semi-civilized Indians.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman stated, I believe, although I did not hear clearly, the number of Indians upon the reservation?

Mr. NELSON. The report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shows that the number is about 1,200, all told.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If I understand, then, it is proposed here to give each of these Indians, to heads of families, one hundred and sixty acres of this land?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And to others eighty acres?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And the balance of it to be opened to homestead settlement after the pine timber is sold off; is that it?

Mr. NELSON. Not exactly. To follow the order of the bill, the Secretary of the Interior shall first reserve sufficient to fill all allotments to the Indians; and he has the authority and is directed to reserve any of the agricultural lands anywhere on the reservation. In other words, the Indians are to have their pick in the first instance. After they have had their pick then the pine on the pine land is to be sold—the stumpage.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Separately from the land?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir; separately from the land, and the Indians are to have this pine land as a common in addition to their farms.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then the pine land is not to be opened to settlement?

Mr. NELSON. No, sir. It is to be reserved for the benefit of the Government, but may be occupied by the Indians as a sort of common.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Reserved for the benefit of the Government?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This is a long bill, and I do not know yet whether it is one which should be passed or not. I should be glad to hear further explanation of it.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. Let me ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. Is there any time limited within which the pine is to be removed?

Mr. NELSON. To prevent the pine being all destroyed at once the bill provides that only one-twentieth shall be sold each year, and the purchasers of stumpage are to have ten years' time within which to cut and remove the pine from the land.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to ask one other important question. Does this Indian tribe give its consent? Do the Indians severally give their consent to this measure?

Mr. NELSON. The bill provides their consent shall be first secured. If their consent is not given the whole bill fails. It all hinges on that.

Mr. SCALES. How long is the land made inalienable?

Mr. NELSON. The land allotted to the Indians in severalty is made inalienable for twenty-five years, so as to prevent its being disposed of to intriguing white men or becoming liable for mortgages or taxation.

Mr. SCALES. That is right.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is this recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. NELSON. The bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Committee on Indian Affairs have unanimously recommended it. One word more and then I am through.

In the northwest part of Minnesota is what is known as the Great Red River Valley, a great treeless waste. It consists of rich agricultural land. At the present time they have to bring their lumber from Minneapolis and Duluth, a distance of from two to three hundred miles, and they are anxious to have this pine contiguous to that country opened, so that they may have the benefit of it. And in order that it may not be despoiled in one year, the provision of the bill is such that it will take twenty years before the pine can be sold.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let me ask the gentleman one other question. As to the residue of the reservation after what goes to the Indians is taken out, how is that to be sold? Is it to be sold in large tracts?

Mr. NELSON. It can not be taken except under the homestead law of the United States, one hundred and sixty acres to each person, with this difference from the homestead law, that the parties taking the land will require to pay 50 cents an acre. The pine timber can be sold after estimation and appraisement.

I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN].

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. I want to know if there is any limitation in the bill as to the pine being open to all? Or may it be bought by some large timber company?

Mr. NELSON. It is to be sold at public sale, one-twentieth part of it, after estimate and appraisement made by three commissioners appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and after public notice.

Mr. WASHBURN. I do not suppose I can make this matter more clear than my colleague has already done. The legislation is in the right direction. I should have been very glad if the Committee on Indian Affairs had reported a bill introduced by myself which was more comprehensive and which took in all the reservation. In the northern part of our State we have an enormous tract of land occupied by very worthless Indians, leading a very miserable, wretched life. I think it is a question that Congress should deal with immediately. I believe these Indians should all be consolidated on one reservation—that they should be removed to the White Earth or Red Lake reservation, where they could be brought under civilizing and Christianizing influences. This bill does not go so far. But so far as it does go it is in the right direction. Here are 3,000,000 acres of land occupied exclusively by about 1,200 miserable, wretched, vagabonds of Indians.

Mr. KEIFER. Of what tribe?

Mr. WASHBURN. The Chippewas. This proposition allows, as my colleague [Mr. NELSON] has stated, the allotment in severalty, giving to each adult Indian one hundred and sixty acres of land. The balance of the land and the pine on it, which is the only value it has, will be sold for the benefit of these Indians, the proceeds to be invested by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Another question right there.

Mr. WASHBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I see that this bill provides that this pine timber shall not be sold for less than $1 per thousand feet of stumpage. There is also a provision in the bill that it may be put up at auction and sold at not less than $2 an acre. Suppose there are 10,000 feet of stumpage on an acre?

Mr. WASHBURN. In the first place, the timber is to be appraised by three commissioners, experts, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, who can not appraise it at less than $1 per thousand feet, board-measure. Afterward the timber on this land is to be put up at public sale and sold to the highest bidder, at which sale it can not be sold at less than $1 a thousand feet.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Or $2 per acre.

Mr. WASHBURN. There is a provision that this sale of the stumpage shall not be at less than $2 per acre; of course with the provision that such a sale shall not be less than $1 per thousand feet.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate in support of the bill has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a single remark in regard to this measure, and I also wish to put a question or two to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. I think that, inasmuch as this bill is a departure from our former policy of legislation, it is exceeding desirable that all the facts involved shall be distinctly understood.

I have read over the measure somewhat hastily, but it seems to me that it is a bill which sufficiently protects the rights of the Indians, and perhaps also protects the rights of the Government. Still, there are one or two points about the bill which I would like to have more information upon.

In the first place, this bill proposes that the Government shall pay these Indians for the agricultural lands on this reservation at the rate of $1.25 an acre, which fund will go to the benefit of the Indians. Then it is provided that the settlers on these lands under the homestead law shall reimburse the Government to the extent of 50 cents an acre. The House will therefore understand that a larger sum is to be paid the Indians for these lands than will be reimbursed to the Government. That, of course, is in harmony with what has always transpired under the homestead policy, because we have frequently paid a larger sum for lands, all expenditures considered, than any amount which was ultimately refunded to the Government.

Mr. WOLFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. A question; yes.

Mr. WOLFORD. Is this at the request of the Indians?

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend will allow me I will come to that in a moment. Having called attention to that feature of the bill, I wish to suggest that if this bill shall pass it will become something more than a law; it will partake of the nature of a treaty between the Indians and the Government, so that the terms of the law may be construed as a contract, all the incidents of which, as touching the settlers on these lands, must be treated as a treaty with the Indians instead of a mere act of legislation. In that view of the case I wish to ask my friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to consent to strike out the word "existing," where it occurs before the words "homestead law," and to insert after the word "homestead" the word "only."

Mr. NELSON. I will agree to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now to come to the point to which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] refers.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would inquire of the Chair if this bill is amendable?

The SPEAKER. It is not, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is what I supposed.

Mr. HOLMAN. One other point. This bill provides that it shall take effect only on its ratification by the Indians at a public meeting, the ratification required being the assent of the headmen of the tribe and of the majority of the male Indians. Am I correct?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; and I will say that that clause was introduced at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WOLFORD. Is this desired by the Indians themselves or is it only for the benefit of a few white men?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not aware that it is pressed by the Indians at all.

Mr. WOLFORD. The Indians are to pay all the expense of estimating the stumpage, &c., before they get any of the money.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no. As I understand this bill the Indians receive the benefit of whatever the stumpage sells for, and also receive from the Government $1.25 an acre for all the land taken up under the homestead law.

Mr. WOLFORD. The bill provides that the expenses must be first taken out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the expenses should be paid out of the funds derived from these lands.

Mr. WOLFORD. Another question, and then I shall be ready to vote. Is it proposed to compel these Indians to settle upon separate farms or will they have a reservation to themselves?

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill provides for allotting to each one of these Indians a certain quantity of land.

Mr. WOLFORD. Are they to be separated or to be together?

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand they are to be in a body.

Mr. WOLFORD. Does the bill say that?

Mr. NELSON. It does.

Mr. HOLMAN. For my own part I regret to see these Indian reservations disturbed, for a reason that may not recommend itself to other gentlemen. By not disturbing these reservations you will at least keep so much land beyond the possibility of being seized upon under laws which I think are unfavorable to the best interests of the country, laws which allow lands to be the subject of speculation. If these Indian reservations are reserved for a time, I think the people will sooner or later insist that these lands shall be for the use of actual settlers. Seeing that such a result must inevitably follow, it seems to me that a bill which secures to actual settlers under favorable conditions the occupancy of the land (in this case at an expense to the settler of 50 cents an acre, thereby reimbursing the Government to some extent for these expenditures), is upon the whole a favorable arrangement, favorable to the Indians, and favorable to the Government, and especially securing for settlement by bona fide settlers at least a portion of these lands, leaving no avenue for speculation except in regard to the timber on the lands. Whether these timber lands could be better guarded than they are in this bill I can not say, for that is a subject I do not understand. But as to the agricultural lands, in regard to which I feel anxious, I think they are safely provided for under the homestead laws only, and no other form of disposition of them should be recognized. I admit that this feature of the bill reconciles me to it, whatever my objection might be as the propriety of interfering with these Indian reservations.

I believe I had promised——

The SPEAKER. The time for debate in support of the bill has expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Does any gentleman desire to be heard in opposition?

Mr. BLOUNT rose.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to be heard in opposition to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it is understood that while I am very anxious this bill should be well understood and should be right, I do not occupy the attitude of being hostile to the measure. I yield five minutes, if I have that much time, to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is in a rather odd attitude—advocating the bill and at the same time taking up the time belonging to the opposition and yielding it about on this side of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know that; but I must say the gentleman is very liberal with what does not belong to him.

Mr. HOLMAN. It shows my good intentions at any rate.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no doubt the gentleman's intention is to pass this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me say that no other gentleman rose to demand a second, and I was very anxious——

Mr. BLOUNT. I rose myself to do so when the gentleman got up.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield with pleasure the fifteen minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is a fine specimen of liberality.

Mr. Speaker, I will venture to say that in the confusion attending the reading of this bill there were not twenty gentlemen on the floor who understood its provisions.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, is not the time for debate on this question exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Eight minutes remain to be occupied in opposition to the bill. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will proceed.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I should not be frank toward this House if I did not confess—and I think almost any other gentleman here will acknowledge the same as to himself—that I scarcely know what this bill contains. It is said we have a recommendation from the Secretary of the Interior, but we have had no opportunity to examine it. It is said the bill comes from the Committee on Indian Affairs, but we have had no opportunity to make any examination of the report. The bill disposes of 3,000,000 acres of the public lands; and we have had no official information as to the character of those lands. We do not know what kind of lands we are disposing of.

In addition to that, sir, what has struck me as objectionable in this bill is the proposed disposition of the Indians on the land. The gentleman who makes this proposition, when asked as to the mode of life of these Indians, was somewhat uncertain as to their exact status. Some of them were farming a little, he thought, and others fishing. Another gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] characterized these poor people in this language: "Wretched, miserable, vagabond Indians." Yet these poor people who have been in the custody of the Government of the United States are, in response to a demand for these lands in Minnesota for settlement, to be made the subjects of a new policy on the part of this Government. The lands are to be divided in severalty among these worthless, vagabond, roving Indians. It has been thought hitherto that even with the best Indians the allotment of the land in this manner was unwise; that under such a policy the superior intelligence of the white men would bring about the utter homelessness of even the best Indians. Yet, sir, you propose to take the vilest form of humanity, according to the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota—you propose to take these ignorant, helpless, vagabond Indians and allot to them lands in severalty. These people, who do not understand the culture of the soil, who are accustomed to making their living by fishing or in similar pursuits, are to be treated as full-grown American citizens and turned loose to the mercy of a class of men who want their lands. Within a period of twenty or twenty-five years, the period within which the power of alienation is to be limited, these Indians (although with opportunities extending over a far greater period they have reached no higher state than that described by the gentleman from Minnesota) are to be turned loose to the machinations of men who are eager to get possession of their lands.

We are told, Mr. Speaker, that the proceeds of these lands are to go into the Treasury as a fund to provide for the Indians. What will those proceeds amount to? No estimate has been presented to the House as to whether or not the money received from these lands will furnish a fund sufficient to take care of these Indians. If the lands should not yield a sufficient fund for this purpose, then we shall have made a serious mistake. We have changed their mode of life. We have taken their fishing and hunting-grounds from them. We have mocked their stupidity by putting them upon one hundred and sixty acres each, saying: "You must do what the American citizen has to do; you must make your own living." There is not a gentleman on this floor who does not know that is a thing that is impracticable. I trust that so grave a policy as this is not to be inaugurated under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The time allotted for debate has expired.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask unanimous consent for time to reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object; they have had two-thirds of the time already on that side.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask by unanimous consent, and I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not object——

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN. I do not wonder the gentleman from Georgia objects to my being heard after he has misrepresented me.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not misrepresented you. I have used your language, as the RECORD will show. I do object. I would not object if we could have full debate. Two-thirds of the time has already been taken up by the other side.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the gentleman from Georgia be permitted to conclude for fifteen minutes and that then the gentlemon from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] be heard.

Mr. THOMPSON. I object.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Indiana having taken the floor with the understanding that he was opposed to the bill, and it since being developed that he was not——

The SPEAKER. The rule of the House allows thirty minutes of debate, and the Chair cannot change that rule.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I trust that the time taken up will be allowed to those opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. There is objection on both sides of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think I have the right as a matter of personal privilege to reply to the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has asked unanimous consent to prolong the debate and it has been objected to.

Mr. THOMPSON. I demand the regular order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has thought proper to say I called for a second and was not opposed to this bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. CHACE. It is impossible to hear what the gentleman from Indiana is saying.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appeals to the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the time for debate be extended.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was not in the attitude of favoring this bill unless it was satisfactorily amended. The gentleman from Minnesota accepted my proposition to amend the bill. I then yielded to the gentleman from Georgia, but inasmuch as he feels injustice has been done him, I trust he will be allowed the balance of his fifteen minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON. I object, because the gentleman from Georgia has had all the time he desired and does not wish for any more and I do not see the use of it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 61.

Mr. WILSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. NELSON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 71.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended and the bill was not passed.

SALE OF SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. DIBRELL moved that the rules be suspended and the House Calendar discharged from the further consideration of the following bill, and that it be passed:

A bill (H. R. 1483) to amend an act passed February 15, 1843, chapter 33, to authorize the Legislatures of certain States to sell certain lands appropriated for school purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the second section of the act of Congress passed February 15, 1843, chapter 33, be amended so as to read as follows, to wit:

"That the Legislatures of the States of Illinois, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee be, and they are hereby, authorized to make such laws and needful regulations as may be deemed expedient to secure and protect from injury or waste the sections reserved by the laws of Congress for the use of schools to each township, and to provide by law, if not deemed expedient to sell, for leasing the same for any term of years they may think proper, in such manner as to render them productive and most conducive to the object for which they are designed."

Mr. HOLMAN. In order that we may have an explanation of this bill I ask that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. DIBRELL. By the act of 1843 it was provided that certain school lands were donated to the States of Tennessee, Arkansas and Louisiana and Illinois, and it was provided that the Legislatures of the States receiving such donations, if deemed inexpedient to sell the lands so donated, might lease them for a term of not exceeding four years. In my district there are four or five sections of these lands which come under the operation of that law, but which have been discovered to be mineral lands or are supposed to be such. The Legislature can not sell the lands without the expenditure of a large amount of money for the development of the mineral upon them. But they find that they can lease them for a term longer than that provided in the act with the right to work the minerals in them. I will state that this bill does not affect any other district in the United States except my own. These lands are of no service to anybody except for the mineral deposits. Now, if they can be leased for a longer period than four years, it is believed that no difficulty will result in disposing of them in that manner and that the amount derived will be larger than if the lands were actually sold.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. How much land is affected by this bill?

Mr. DIBRELL. Only four or five sections.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

TAX UPON SPIRITS DISTILLED FROM GRAIN.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is unwise and inexpedient for the present Congress to abolish or reduce the tax upon spirits distilled from grain.

Mr. COX of North Carolina, Mr. WHITE of Kentucky, Mr. WARNER of Ohio, and others demanded a second.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. If there be no objection, I hope a second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, and Mr. THOMPSON were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 135, noes 29.

So the motion was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule thirty minutes will be allowed for debate—fifteen on each side.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Who will control the time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky who submitted the motion will control the time in support of the proposition. Several gentlemen demanded a second.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask permission to occupy a part of the time in opposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina will control the time in opposition.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to allow me to offer a substitute for the resolution.

Mr. THOMPSON. I can not yield for that purpose. I ask now, Mr. Speaker, in behalf of gentlemen who have not clearly heard the resolution, that it be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. THOMPSON. I reserve the time in support of this measure until I hear from the other side.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. YORK].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let us reserve the whole time on both sides and come to a vote. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. YORK] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. YORK. Mr. Speaker, this resolution, in my judgment, is unwise and uncalled for at the present time. I know that it is the opinion and the wish of the people of this country that these revenue laws should be modified materially or totally abolished. I am satisfied that the wisest thing this Congress can do would be to modify, if not repeal, the internal-revenue laws. There is a demand for their repeal or material modification from all sections of the country. It is a war tax, the remains of a war measure, and my people demand a repeal of it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. YORK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state the reasons why the tax should be repealed upon whisky and laid upon the necessities of life?

Mr. YORK. I see no necessity for the tax. All of them ought to be reduced or repealed as far as possible, or as far as consistent with the needs of the Government.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me finish the question. What reason can you assign for reducing the tax on whisky or making whisky free and keeping the tax on bread?

Mr. YORK. We must deal with this question as a great public measure. The Government of this country is in a condition to enable it to repeal the tax, and I stand here as a Representative from the State of North Carolina opposed to the adoption of any such resolution as that introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky. I want to see this law wiped from the statute-books altogether.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the time has not yet come, in my opinion, when this country is in a condition nor are the people willing that the tax on distilled spirits shall be taken off. The proposition before the House is delusive. We are asked to pledge ourselves, by the adoption of this resolution, to wipe out in the estimation of some the entire internal-revenue system, or if we vote the other way it will be construed that we are in favor of the internal-revenue laws remaining as they are now, from both of which I most respectfully dissent.

If it were in order to offer a substitute at this time I should ask permission to offer the following:

That it is the opinion of this House that the tax on all distilled spirits should be reduced to 50 cents per gallon after July 1, 1887; and that it is the opinion of this House that the tax on spirits distilled from grain and deposited in bond after July 1, 1884, should be due and payable within sixty days after said spirits shall have been deposited in the bonded warehouses.

My reason is this: to undo the law passed in 1878 extending the bonded period three years, and undo the bad effects of the Carlisle bill of 1880, which gave to the distillers seven and one-half gallons of leakage and possible outage on each barrel of forty gallons; which gave the repeal of the stamp on the cask and many other privileges which large distillers are now using to enable them to accumulate millions of gallons of whisky in the warehouses, on which they hope to realize by extensions of the bonded period and then an abolition of the tax, or, failing in that, by a reduction of the tax from 90 to 50 cents, so as to leave the whisky monopolists 40 cents profit on each gallon.

If you will give the distillers notice that they must quit putting this whisky in bonded warehouses, that there is no hope for them in the future from abolishing the system and freeing them of the tax on all the whisky or any part they may have at this time in hand, you will do a good thing for all the useful business interests of this country, and possibly for the unhappy distillers themselves, who I trust will stop that bad business and use their immense capital in making the country prosperous and happy.

By passing the resolution now pending you say to these distillers, "We propose to allow the whisky law to remain as it is now." I say we should not allow it to remain as it is now. The tax may be too high, but we should not reduce it in such a way as to give the men who have 80,000,000 gallons in bond the benefit of a reduction of 40 cents on each gallon. We ought to give notice that whatever they make after the 1st July, 1884, shall not be allowed to remain in bond over sixty days, and, so as not to do injustice to holders of distilled spirits made under existing law, that after the 1st July, 1887, the tax will be reduced to 50 cents a gallon. This resolution may be construed to be in the interest of the distillers who have 80,000,000 gallons of whisky now in bonded warehouses under the operation of the existing law unless some notice of this kind be given.

If I have any time left I yield it back to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute of his time left.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I oppose this resolution, because it is proposed to deal by piecemeal with the great subject of tariff reform, which must soon engage the attention of this House. It is unjust to many members who can not fully hear or clearly comprehend the resolution before they are called upon to vote. It is unjust to the measure itself and to cognate subjects with which it has been associated. Who expected it to be brought up to-day, and how can it be properly discussed under a suspension of the rules? The only effect of such legislation is to distract and divide our counsels. Many members, unable to explain their votes, through fear of encountering a sentiment in opposition to free whisky, may be driven to vote for it. Desiring to reflect the sentiments of the people of my State as expressed through her Legislature, I will endeavor to have abolished the whole internal-revenue system.

As the effect of this resolution will be to prolong the continuance of this odious and iniquitous revenue and embarrass other reforms to which we have partially agreed, I most earnestly protest against its passage. All excise laws have ever been odious to a free and independent people, and the present one has exposed many of the people of my State to persecutions and outrages too numerous to mention. If their burdens can not be removed by a change in the method of its collection, and it is doubtful whether they can, I would cut out the cancer, and leave the States to impose such taxes and restrictions upon the manufacture of whisky as they might deem expedient. We are becoming too much the slaves of the tax-gatherer and pay too little regard to the liberties of the humbler classes. If this subject was considered in connection with other matters of taxation the House might devise some expedients by which our revenues might be reformed. At least it is worthy of the experiment. Sprung upon us as this resolution now is, it can accomplish no good; for what is expedient to-day may become inexpedient to-morrow. It may inure to the benefit of the whisky monopolists of the West, but we are not here to legislate for that class and should not suffer ourselves to be deceived by the measure.

This whisky monopoly in the West is now coining its millions of dollars. It has no sympathy for the minor distillers scattered throughout this land. Why can it not wait until the whole revenue subject shall be acted upon? Does it fear the weakness of its proposition? If so, we should not be driven from our expressed determination to consider tariff reform and internal taxation in conjunction with each other. The moral element is not involved in this question, for many of the wisest and most judicious moral reformers desire to see an absolute divorce between the Government and the manufacturers of distilled spirits. Let us, then, move on as we have started, and not be led astray by such resolutions as the present, but decently and in order present to the country such a system of reforms as will command its confidence and respect, which I fear will not be accomplished by the legislation proposed by this resolution.

Mr. YORK. I desire just one minute more.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I yield another minute to my colleague.

Mr. YORK. I want to know if it will be in order to offer a substitute for this resolution in the form of a bill.

The SPEAKER. Not without the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. YORK. I ask unanimous consent.

Several members objected.

Mr. YORK. I would like to have the bill read.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to its consideration.

Mr. YORK. Then I will read it as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to do that.

Mr. YORK read, as follows, the bill which he desired to propose as a substitute:

A bill to repeal the internal-revenue laws on distilled spirits and tobacco, with all amendments adding to or enlarging the same.

Whereas the Government of the United States has from its earliest existence deemed it wisest and best to collect the necessary revenues to support the General Government by a tax upon imports; and

Whereas the late civil war made it necessary for the time to levy additional taxes for the support of her armies, and the increased burdens placed upon the Government mainly growing out of the troubled condition of the country from the effects of the war; and

Whereas the late civil war has been closed for a period of about nineteen years; and

Whereas the country is now enjoying a state of profound peace, prosperity, and happiness; and

Whereas the United States Treasury has now a large surplus on hand, showing conclusively no necessity for the Government continuing longer the extra burdens of taxation known as the war taxes; and

Whereas the people cry out against the further continuance of the internal-revenue laws, believing that the time has fully arrived for their repeal; and

Whereas the demands of the Government, economically administered, can be amply met by the tax on imports: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay the interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," passed June 30, 1864, and all acts amending, enlarging, or adding to the same, and all laws authorizing the collection of internal revenue on distilled spirits and tobacco, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That on all unbroken packages of distilled spirits, smoking and manufactured tobacco, cigars, snuff, and cigarettes, in the hands of dealers or manufacturers at the time such repeal shall take effect, upon which the tax has been paid, there shall be a drawback or rebate of the full amount of the taxes paid; but the same shall not apply in any case where the claim has not been presented within ninety days following the date of repeal.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to adopt such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry this act into effect.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield two minutes to my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. I sympathize most heartily with my friend from North Carolina in his complaint of the administration of the internal-revenue law. But I do not sympathize with him and with other gentlemen who desire to remove or reduce the tax on whisky. I stand here for one for dear whisky. I believe that it is an article that will bear taxation. It is a luxury and it ought to bear taxation.

But I will not enter into that part of the discussion. I look at this matter from a business standpoint. The Federal Government has established certain relations toward this great interest. What has been the result? We find millions of gallons of whisky on the market without a purchaser. We find also that here in Congress there is a number of bills which have been introduced contemplating an abolition of the entire tax on whisky. Congress thus stands with sword uplifted over the head of this great interest; yet every man around me knows that there is not the remotest probability that that sword will ever descend.

It is due, therefore, to that interest that we should declare upon this floor that there is no possibility, there is no probability, that this Congress will either reduce or remove the tax on spirits distilled from grain, and let those interested in this great interest go on with their business, and no longer permit this threat to hang over them, which we know will never be executed. They do not know, they can not know, whether Congress has any such intention or not. But we who are here know that no such action will take place.

This vote will disclose the fact that out of the three hundred and twenty-five members upon this floor probably not 25 per cent. of them will be willing to go home to their constituents and say that they have accomplished one result for them if no other—they have made a glass of whisky cheaper by their legislation in Congress. Nor will they be willing to go home and say that, without any hope of result, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX] admits (because he says that he does not hope that this Congress will legislate on this subject)—that without any hope of result they will agitate this question to the destruction of a great interest that has paid a thousand millions of dollars into the Treasury of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VANCE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] if he will aid us in modifying the system of internal taxation so as to remove the oppressive features of it?

Mr. WILLIS. I will do so whenever you give us the opportunity.

Mr. VANCE. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I will yield two minutes of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON].

Mr. KASSON. After the explanation of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] I hardly think it is necessary for me to say much, if anything, upon this question. But I observe that whenever the question of whisky arises here at first the House reels around it in a state of uncertainty as to the object of the movement. And when the gentlemen from Kentucky raise the question here I must confess that this side of the House is at first apprehensive that their object is not entirely consistent with our views upon the subject.

I wanted to say upon this question what I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] who has just spoken desires the House to understand and which I understood from the beginning to be the object of this resolution. It is that those engaged in this manufacture are now, by reason of the defeat the other day of the bill to extend the bonded period for distilled spirits, a result in which I concurred—they are now subjected to great expense in removing from the country a large amount of property and bringing it back again at a later period when there will be a market for it. And further than that, they are liable to severe financial disturbances as long as they remain in doubt touching the action to be taken by Congress upon the subject of taxation.

I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] that this House can not during the present Congress take action looking to removing the tax on whisky. Our revenue from duties on imports is not sufficient to pay the current and necessary expenses of the Government. I think I speak the feeling on this side of the House when I say that the last internal tax to be taken off will be the tax on whisky.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would inquire of the gentleman, what would be the deficiency in the revenues of the Government if the internal-revenue system were entirely abolished?

Mr. KASSON. I have not the figures before me, but the deficiency would be a great many millions.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Would it be about forty millions of dollars?

Mr. KASSON. I have not the figures before me and cannot state the amount, but I have no doubt it would be a great many millions of dollars.

The point I wish to get at is this: I shall vote for this resolution—first, because I think we ought not to take the tax off whisky; and secondly, I think we can not during this Congress remove the tax from spirits distilled from grain without creating a deficit in the revenues of the Government.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I now yield one minute of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. One minute is rather a brief space of time in which to discuss a measure of this importance, but I shall probably scarcely require even that much for what I have to say, though if the measure were presented under different circumstances I should feel inclined to discuss it at some length. The resolution itself is unimportant except to give expression to the judgment of the House concerning a question that has a most important connection with the whole subject of tariff legislation, and in this regard I would if opportunity favored give my views at some length.

I desire simply at present to express my emphatic dissent from what I believe to be the dangerous heresy that is gradually gaining a lodgment in the minds of many gentlemen for whose opinions and judgments I have great respect. I do not believe it is a safe or a wise policy to be adopted by this House to remove the tax from an article that yields so large a revenue, that is of such general consumption, and which is so far removed from those commodities which can in any sense be considered necessities.

Under any other circumstances and in respect to almost any other question relating even remotely to the question of revenue I should be inclined to yield my judgment to the views expressed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX], and insist that this proposition should be considered in the general revenue or tariff bill, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] having it in charge has just assured us will be brought before the House for consideration on Tuesday next, but I regard the disposition to remove the tax from whisky as so dangerous and pernicious a one, that I feel it my duty to denounce it on every suitable occasion. I detest the present system of collecting internal revenue as much as any gentleman on this floor, but until we can spare the money derived from this source out of the necessary revenues of the Federal Government and devise some means by which it can be collected by the States, I can not give my consent to except it from the operations of existing laws, however odious their execution may be. When we reach this point I will most cheerfully lend my aid in abolishing the system which has brought so much reproach upon the administration of a necessary law.

One of the reasons which influenced my vote this morning against the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] to restore the duty upon wool was my belief that no one article subject to taxation should be considered except in connection with a general tariff bill, but the article of whisky is very different from wool, and the proposition to exempt it from taxation is so repugnant to my ideas of sound policy that I feel it my duty as a public man to oppose it even if I have but one minute in which to do it. Better let the tax remain on whisky and take it off of some one of the thousand articles of general use and necessity upon which a most burdensome and oppressive taxation is now imposed.

Mr. THOMPSON. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD].

Mr. BUDD. Mr. Speaker, whisky could be made and sold at a profit for 25 cents per gallon were it not for the heavy tax it bears. I favor the retention of that tax, and shall resist any effort made to remove it. One of my reasons for favoring the bonded extension bill was that I believed the opponents of that measure desired to defeat it that they might coerce a repeal of the tax; their leading speakers proclaimed that they favored such repeal.

In 1862 the Government began to levy a tax on whisky. From 1825 to 1861 whisky ranged in price from 15 to 48 cents per gallon, generally being less than 40 cents; it never reached 50 cents. This statement is based on official reports. A repeal of the tax at this time would encourage local stills to spring up throughout the country, as their cost is nominal, and local producers could profitably sell the article at 30 cents per gallon.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Does not the gentleman know that during the period he speaks of there was far less whisky made and far less drunkenness than there has been since the tax was imposed?

Mr. BUDD. Formerly the grain went into other industries; now there is often an overproduction. There is a stimulated production and consumption of whisky. As the gentleman has asked the question, I wish to state that from 1870 to 1880 the increase in the appetite for, and consumption of, liquor was fearfully rapid.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. By reason of the monopoly?

Mr. BUDD. No, sir. By reason of the extension and expansion of this business.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUDD. Allow me one moment to say, in answer to the gentleman from North Carolina, that in 1870 there were only 14,362 saloonkeepers and bar-tenders in the United States, but in 1880, ten years later, there were 68,461, an increase of nearly 400 per cent. I say that the appetite for liquor, as indicated by the above facts, has grown too rapidly to justify us in cutting down the tax on this article so that it might be profitably sold for 40 cents a gallon, 10 cents a quart, or a cent a drink.

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I concur with those who favor the adoption of this resolution, for the reason that the trade demands we should put a quietus upon this question. But that is not my only reason. I am in favor of the resolution because the great mass the people of this country desire to have whisky taxed. We are now realizing a revenue of nearly $70,000,000 a year from the manufacture of distilled spirits and the license to deal in them. This amount of revenue can not be raised in any other way with so little burden upon our tax-paying people. Therefore I desire there shall be an understanding reached now by this House and notice given to the country that this tax, yielding $70,000,000 a year, shall remain until the public debt is paid, and until the people can get blankets and other necessaries of life cheaper. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think it necessary that much should be said on this proposition. The intelligence of the House has already agreed to it. No gentleman who has chosen to oppose it has, so far as I have heard, given any reason why the tax on whisky should be reduced or abolished. I have listened to both the gentlemen from North Carolina, who, while opposed in party politics, are united at least upon one question, free whisky, cheap whisky, untaxed intoxication; but I can not understand what is their objection to maintaining this tax. To speak of the internal-revenue system in the presence of the Representatives from that State seems almost like raising a red rag in front of a mad bull—all North Carolina immediately bristles up and makes an attack upon it. One would suppose that unless we repeal the tremendous "war taxes" of which gentlemen speak they would not have enough constituents left to hold an election; that the whole population had gone into "moonshining;" had fled to their mountain fastnesses to escape deputy marshals, whose presence they seem to dread worse than Ali Baba did the forty thieves or the devil turned loose for a thousand years.

Why, sir, this is no more a "war tax" than our other taxes. All our taxes, we are told, are "war taxes." Whenever our eloquent friends here speak on the subject of reducing the tariff, they want it reduced because it is "war taxes;" and now my friend from North Carolina wants to take off the whisky tax because it is a "war tax." But where are you going to get money to pay the pensions of your crippled soldiers and to provide the large educational fund which gentlemen are talking about distributing to the States for the purpose of educating the illiterate not only of my friend's State but all over the country? where are you to get money to redeem your national bonds unless you raise part of it by this tax on whisky?

You have nearly a hundred millions a year to provide for pensions; you need over fifty millions for interest on your national debt; you have nearly fifty millions of sinking fund to provide for, and two hundred and fifty-eight millions of past-due bonds, besides all the ordinary expenses of the Government. Will you tax clothes higher? will you tax blankets higher? They are already nearly 100 per cent. Coarse woolen clothes for the poor are now seventy-eight. Will you give the laboring man cheap whisky and high-priced clothes? Men who labor do not drink whisky, but every necessary which they and their half-naked, half-starved children eat and wear is nearly doubled in price by your taxes. If you reduce or abolish this tax upon the idle vagabonds, sots, and drunkards, you take the clothes off the back and necessaries of life in proportion from the honest, industrious laborer. The tax paid for whisky drunk by the idle is a voluntary tax paid by the vicious. If you do not like the tax, let up on the drink and you can escape. But the tax upon woolen goods, blankets, flannels, hats, shoes, and other necessaries must be paid, and when they double the price of the article, as they now do, they rob the poor man of one-half of his day's toil. Who demands the surrender of this tax? The steel-rail monopoly of Pennsylvania; the ironmongers of Pittsburgh; the woolen and cotton manufacturers of the East. The laborer does not want it, the people do not ask it, the drunkard does not expect it, and the vicious do not care for it. Let it alone.

Mr. Speaker, every time a member from Kentucky has risen on this floor it has been insinuated that he wanted to repeal the tax on whisky. Now, I want it distinctly understood that so far as Kentucky is concerned, though she is the largest manufacturer of whisky in the Union except the State of Illinois, she will favor the maintenance of this tax on whisky so long as the tax is laid on the consumer and so long as the money raised by it can be applied to any great public purpose.

Mr. HORR. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I think he and I agree. He is for laying a tax on whisky; so am I. I am also in favor of collecting this tax. Is the gentleman?

Mr. THOMPSON. I have always been in favor of collecting the tax. I do not know but my friend has paid as much of it as I have. I have no doubt about that. From his size I would suppose he had paid more. [Laughter.] I have no doubt his State is as great a consumer of a good article of whisky as any other State.

Mr. HORR. You misunderstand me. It was not a personal question. I wish to know whether my friends from Kentucky are both in favor of levying the tax on whisky and collecting it?

Several MEMBERS. Paying it, you mean.

Mr. THOMPSON. They are in favor of collecting it on all that Michigan shall consume.

Mr. HORR. We always pay it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope you do. No doubt you pay your part of it.

As far as this great whisky interest of our State is concerned it is in this attitude: the action of the House taken two weeks ago has put them where they can not borrow money to pay their taxes as they fall due because they have a threat hanging over them that Congress will reduce the tax to 50 cents a gallon or it may repeal it. No man will lend the money to pay the tax when it amounts to confiscation of the property in his hands either to reduce or abolish it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. THOMPSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 179, nays 33, not voting 110; as follows:

YEAS—179.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 8, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D., of Washington, D. C.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of James L. Andem, stenographer, of Washington, D. C., on the subject of stenographic work for committees of the Senate, investigations, &c.; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. HILL. I present a petition signed by the officers of twenty national banks and banking houses of Colorado, and a large number of business firms in Utah, and unanimously adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Denver, Colo., praying for the enactment of a law which shall require banks to keep 10 or 15 per cent. of their legal reserves in silver coin. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I present a memorial of the Burlington (Iowa) Plow Company and other manufacturers and citizens of Burlington, Iowa, remonstrating against the enactment of the proposed amendments of the patent laws. The memorial is addressed to the Senators from Iowa, but is evidently intended to be considered by the Senate. I therefore present it, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present sundry memorials of citizens of Connecticut remonstrating against a hostile modification or repeal of the present patent laws. These memorials are addressed to myself and my colleague in the form of letters, but as they are evidently intended for the action of Congress, I ask that they be received and referred to the Committee on Patents.

A memorial of the American Watch Company, of Waltham, Mass.;

A memorial of J. G. Batterson, of Hartford, Conn.; and

A memorial of the Hartford Silver Plate Company and 4 other manufacturers and patentees of Hartford, Conn.

Mr. CALL. I present a memorial of the Pensacola Board of Trade, which sets forth that the city of Pensacola has direct connection by rail on the north to the great lakes, and on the east to the Atlantic Ocean, while other and shorter local lines connect it with Perdido Bay and River, and with the rich timber, cotton, and agricultural lands of Southern Alabama and Georgia. It also sets forth that the channel on the bar requires a deepening to the depth of twenty-six or thirty feet in order to afford proper care and protection for the commerce and shipping of that port. It further states that steamers drawing thirty feet can be loaded at the railroad wharves from the cars alongside, saving all terminal expenses, lighterage, drayage, and such charges as would apply to rehandling. It asks for an adequate appropriation of $250,000 for deepening and enlarging the channel over the new bar recently formed inside of the old channel at the entrance of the harbor for the protection of the navy-yard of the city of Pensacola. This memorial also sets forth that a depth of twenty-six or thirty feet of water can easily be obtained. A new bar has been formed in consequence of the sinking of vessels which were placed there during the war.

The statistics which accompany this memorial exhibit that in 1881 there were 557 vessels at Pensacola, of which 435 were foreign vessels engaged in foreign commerce and 122 coastwise; that in 1882 there were 608 vessels at the port of Pensacola, of which 502 were foreign ships; in 1883 there were 559, of which 435 were foreign ships. The value of foreign exports in 1883 in the port of Pensacola was $2,242,417; the value of coastwise exports, $500,000; tonnage dues received at that place, $47,045; duties on imports, $4,958.64. Clearances: Steamships, 1883, 559; tonnage, 391,566. Value of timber, cotton, wool, molasses, potatoes, &c., of Choctawhatchee region tributary to Pensacola, $10,000,000; trade up the river, $2,000,000.

I ask the attention of the Committee on Commerce especially to these facts and to the petition, which I shall make a part of my remarks, and to the importance of this port and the necessity of action by that committee for the protection of the harbor from the bar, which is rapidly forming and interfering with the valuable and increasing foreign and domestic commerce of that important port. My colleague since his service here has constantly brought the interests of Pensacola to the attention of Congress and given it great prominence before Congress and the country. I have since I have been here, and very recently on several occasions, brought the interests of this port to the attention of Congress, and the Representative of that district has obtained for it repeatedly the favorable consideration of the other House. Congress has not failed to respond liberally to their efforts, but the increasing commercial and military importance of Pensacola and the high character and enterprise of her merchants demand a favorable consideration of the prayer of this petition.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1850) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The proposed amendment is to enable the State Department to restore for the use of the Congressional Library about one hundred and thirty medals that were purchased and given to the Library in 1822 by George W. Erving, who had formerly been our minister to Spain, which were then considered to be very valuable French and American medals, having been made by the French Government in the highest style of art. The first were lost by shipwreck, while being transported from France to the United States. Mr. Erving thereupon procured duplicates, and these were presented to and accepted by Congress and placed in the Library, but were destroyed by the fire in the Library in 1851.

By correspondence with the State Department I have learned that the Secretary, after communicating with our minister at Paris, has ascertained that the French Government will furnish duplicates of these medals at barely the cost, which will be about 322 francs, or about sixty or seventy-five dollars.

I ask to have the amendment and the papers in relation to the subject printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont from the Committee on Finance reports an amendment from that committee intended to be proposed to the so-called sundry civil appropriation bill. The amendment, together with the accompanying papers, if there be no objection, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PLUMB. On the 19th of March I reported from the Committee on Public Lands, by its direction, the bill (S. 1886) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, reserving at the time the privilege for the committee to submit a written report at a subsequent date. I now present the report from the committee. I will also state that the minority of the committee desire to submit their views, and I ask that that privilege be granted to them at a subsequent day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred and from which has been reported the bill indicated by him, now makes a written report from that committee on the subject. The report will be printed. He also asks that the views of the minority of the committee on the same subject may be presented hereafter.

Mr. MORGAN. The views of the minority of the committee have been presented and are now in charge of the Chief Clerk.

Mr. ALLISON. They have been presented?

Mr. MORGAN. They have been presented but not printed.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I ask that the views of the minority be printed in connection with the report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the views of the minority will be printed in connection with the report of the majority.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, made the following report; which was ordered to be placed on the Calendar:

The Senate Committee on Patents, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 328, to authorize Alexy von Schmidt to bring suit in the Court of Claims, make the following report, namely:

That said Senate bill No. 328 was by said committee transmitted to the Court of Claims with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, by order of the committee made on the 20th day of March, 1884, to be proceeded with by said Court of Claims according to the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1883.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1970) for the payment of certain coupons of certain Indian war bonds of the State of California, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. BOWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1554) for the relief of S. N. Wood, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2487) for the relief of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not a unanimous report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of the Soldiers and Sailors' Association of Southwestern Michigan, praying for the establishment of a national home for disabled soldiers in Michigan, there having been two petitions of the same kind presented, being duplicates of each other, have instructed me to report the same back to the Senate and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The committee has already reported a bill for the establishment of one home west of the Mississippi River, and deem that sufficient for the present.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND introduced a bill (S. 2015) for the relief of Margaret Hammett, widow and administratrix of John J. Hammett, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the bill for the relief of Isaac Davenport and others, known as the "Richmond rent leases," be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am requested by a Senator who is absent to ask for the following order:

Ordered, That all papers in the case of Thomas F. Riley be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be granted subject to the rules.

PRINTING OF EDUCATIONAL BILL.

On motion of Mr. BLAIR, it was Ordered, That Senate bill No. 398, to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, as passed and engrossed, be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

CAMP DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule, commencing at Order of Business 219, being Senate bill No. 478.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 478) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department certain parts of the Camp Douglas military reservation, in the Territory of Utah.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the money paid by Charles Popper for the survey of the land, as hereinbefore provided for, shall be deducted from the cost of the entry therof.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the report may be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAMPTON February 12, 1884:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 478) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department certain parts of the Camp Douglas military reservation, in the Territory of Utah, beg leave to report back the bill with an amendment striking out the proviso, and in this shape the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and goes over.

Mr. HAMPTON. I ask the Senator who made the objection to withdraw it for a moment. I think that I can explain the bill so that there will be no objection to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the objection for the time being.

Mr. HAMPTON. The report which was read was simply a short statement of the fact of the favorable action of the committee; but in the Forty-fifth Congress there was a very voluminous report made embodying all the facts. Those facts were that this man had settled upon the land before the reservation was laid off; he put up extensive and expensive buildings there; and a board of officers were summoned to see what disposition should be made of the land. That board unanimously reported that the Government did not want it, and it would be better for him to retain the piece of land which was of no use at all to the Government. The maps accompany the papers, and there is a letter from the General of the Army and all the officers out there recommending this disposition of it.

The report is so long that I do not wish to detain the Senate by reading it, but the facts are substantially as I have stated them. I have no doubt that the Senators from that section who are familiar with all the details can substantiate what I have said. I can only say that after full investigation in the Military Committee, with all the papers before us, the committee made a unanimous report that the bill should pass, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Do I understand the Senator from South Carolina to state that this claimant settled on the land before the military reservation was laid off?

Mr. HAMPTON. Long before the reservation was laid off.

Mr. PLUMB. I will ask the Senator from South Carolina if the bill has not been reported at some previous time from some committee favorably?

Mr. HAMPTON. Not at this session, but I have here a favorable report made in the Forty-fifth Congress from which I gather the facts I have stated; and it was acted upon in the Forty-seventh Congress also. I read from the report made in the Forty-fifth Congress:

From the record filed in the case, it appears, by Executive Document No. 97, House of Representatives, first session Forty-fourth Congress, that Mr. Charles Popper settled in the Territory of Utah in the year 1864, and that he purchased of certain herders of cattle, then settled upon lands now comprised within the military reservation of Camp Douglas, their possessory rights thereupon, together with certain improvements, consisting of a log cabin and corral, for the sum of $800. Immediately thereafter he erected a slaughter-house and corral on the said land, at an outlay of $2,000, dug a ditch of a quarter of a mile in length, laid pipes from a certain spring contiguous to the slaughter-house, at an additional cost of $500. In the year 1865 he erected a cut-stone rock building thereon, at the cost of $14,000, and expended in other improvements, such as outhouses, stables, &c., not less than $10,000 additional, making the total outlay upon said land the sum of $26,500. He has occupied said premises and held peaceable possession thereof ever since.

At this time (1865) the land was unsurveyed, and no land office had been established by the Government in Utah Territory. On September 3, 1867, however, and prior to any survey, the extension of the Camp Douglas military reservation was ordered to be established by the President, and was so announced in General Order No. 66, headquarters Department of the Platte, December 17, 1869.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BOWEN. In addition to what the Senator from South Carolina has just said in regard to the bill, I will state that a similar bill was reported favorably in Forty-fifth and Forty-seventh Congresses, and that it passed the Senate in the Forty-fifth Congress and passed the House in the Forty-fourth Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLORIDA INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. HAMPTON. I move that the bill with the accompanying papers be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. There is some further information to be laid before the committee, I am informed, and I prefer that disposition of it.

The motion to recommit was agreed to.

UNITED STATES STEAMER MONITOR.

The bill for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States steamer Monitor who participated in the action with the rebel ironclad Merrimac on the 9th day of March, 1862, was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the present consideration of that bill under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to and goes over.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, before——

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw the objection to hear anything the Senator may have to say.

Mr. HALE. Of course I know the Senator or any Senator by an objection can send the bill to the other Calendar. I only wish to say to the Senator from Missouri and to the body that this is a bill that has passed the Senate in another Congress, that no changes have been made in the provisions of the bill then passed; it is an old subject thoroughly understood by everybody, and I believe that under the five minutes' debate we could dispose of the bill within the next fifteen or twenty minutes. I hope the Senator may withdraw his objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I can not withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state that I do not consider that it is necessary to consume the time of the Senate in discussing this bill when it has been reported adversely at the other end of the Capitol at the present session. We can certainly employ our time to better advantage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that it is not in order to refer to the proceedings of the other House of Congress.

Mr. HALE. And particularly not in order to refer to them incorrectly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order to refer to them in any way. The Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5261) making an appropriation for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. 1483) to amend an act passed February 15, 1843, chapter 33, to authorize the Legislatures of certain States to sell certain lands appropriated for school purposes, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the bill may be reported at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the second section of the act of Congress passed February 15, 1843, chapter 33, be amended so as to read as follows, to wit:

"That the Legislatures of the States of Illinois, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee be, and they are hereby, authorized to make such laws and needful regulations as may be deemed expedient to secure and protect from injury or waste the sections reserved by the laws of Congress for the use of schools to each township, and to provide by law, if not deemed expedient to sell, for leasing the same for any term of years they may think proper, in such manner as to render them productive and most conducive to the object for which they are designed."

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me as though to follow the course that bills of that kind usually take it should go to the Committee on Public Lands. I only make the suggestion, however.

Mr. COCKRELL. It seems to me that the bill should go to the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the fact of the quantity of public land the State of Tennessee has ever had.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive any motion, but the Chair was under the impression, as the bill relates to the disposition of a fund for education, that the proper reference would be to the Committee on Education and Labor. The Chair will of course receive any motion for a different reference.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, then, that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY PAYMASTERS' CLERKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 207) to amend section 1190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to paymasters' clerks of the United States Army, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to and goes over.

CHARLES C. HILL.

The bill (S. 875) for the relief of Charles C. Hill, of Urbana, Ohio, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is an adverse report. I ask that it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to and goes over.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw the objection to hear the Senator.

Mr. SEWELL. The bill was placed on the Calendar at the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SHERMAN. I would prefer that it remain there until I get certain information, when I may want it recommitted.

Mr. SEWELL. Then let it go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it go over under objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

O. L. COCHRAN.

The bill (S. 1481) for the relief of O. L. Cochran, late postmaster at Houston, Tex., was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the consideration of that bill.

L. MADISON DAY.

The bill (S. 86) for the relief of L. Madison Day was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think we can consider that under the five-minute rule. It is an old case, very familiar here, and it will probably lead to considerable discussion.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It has passed the Senate several times.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made and the bill goes over.

JOSEPH M. CUMMING AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 70) for the relief of Joseph M. Cumming, Hamilton J. Miller, and William McRoberts was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear the report read in that case.

Mr. ALLISON. There are some amendments to the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The bill as introduced did not meet with the approval of the Committee on Claims and there are radical amendments recommended by that committee. The bill as recommended by the committee is a very harmless bill. I think every Senator will admit that when he looks at the amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose we hear the amendments read first.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let the amendments be read now for information.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read as it is proposed to be amended, so that we can get the tenor of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendments recommended by the Committee on Claims will be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill as proposed to be amended be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be read as if all the amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. As proposed to be amended the bill would read:

That Joseph M. Cumming, Hamilton J. Miller, and William McRoberts, late copartners in the business of commission merchants and bonded warehousemen in the city of New York, be permitted to sue in the Court of Claims; which court shall pass upon the law and facts as to the liability of the United States for the acts of its officer, Joshua F. Bailey, by reason of the seizure, detention, and closing up of the commission houses and bonded warehouses of said copartners, for the breaking up and interruptfon of their said business, and for the seizure and detention of the property, books, and papers in and connected with said business, by Joshua F. Bailey, collector of internal revenue for the fourth internal-revenue district of said State or by said Bailey and other internal-revenue officers. The United States shall appear to defend against said suit, and either party may appeal to the Supreme Court as in ordinary cases against the United States in said court; and said suit may be maintained, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. COCKRELL. Still I should like to hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I shall object to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The further consideration of the bill is objected to, and it goes over.

STATE OF NEBRASKA.

The bill (S. 483) for the relief of the State of Nebraska was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill was reported adversely. It is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON. In the absence of my colleague [Mr. VAN WYCK] I ask that the consideration of the bill be postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM P. RANDALL.

The bill (S. 76) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy was announced as next in order.

Mr. HALE. In the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] who reported the bill from the Naval Committee, I ask that it be passed over retaining its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over retaining its place at the head of the Calendar, the Chair believing that no other bill has been passed over retaining its place. Is there objection to this request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRACTICE IN PATENT SUITS.

The bill (H. R. 3925) to regulate practice in patent suits was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is a special order, and therefore the Chair assumes that it is not fair to take it up in the regular order on the Calendar at this time.

Mr. PLATT. It is perfectly apparent that that bill can not be disposed of under any five-minute rule, and it stands as a special order and I think it had better remain so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On reflection the Chair thinks that when the Senate has directed that a particular bill be made a special order for a special day it takes it out of the general Calendar for the time being until some other order is made.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If it is in order in this connection, I should like to ask if this bill, together with other bills now before the Senate relating to the patent laws—as many and all the measures seem to me to be very crude and do not reach the difficulty that has been urged against the patent laws—can not be recommitted. I would ask if the committee would not assent to have these bills all recommitted, and then report back to the Senate some well digested plan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can only proceed by unanimous consent, the bill not being before the Senate. If there be no objection the Senator from New Jersey will proceed.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I give notice that I shall ask leave to submit a motion to recommit all these patent bills to the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not interrupt debate on his own motion.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The bill not being before the Senate, I shall ask leave to make the motion to recommit at the proper time.

M. H. COLLINS.

The bill (S. 1122) for the relief of M. H. Collins was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MITCHELL February 14, 1884:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1122) for the relief of Michael H. Collins, having considered the same, respectfully submit the following report:

This bill was favorably considered and reported by the committee of both Houses in the Forty-seventh Congress, but was not considered by either House.

The bill now reported is precisely the same as that reported by this committee on the 6th of July, 1882, except the proviso, which renders it wholly unobjectionable as now presented, and your committee report the same favorably and recommend its passage, for the reasons stated in their former report, which was as follows:

"Michael H. Collins invented a kerosene-oil lamp burner, for which letters patent were issued to him September 19, 1865. The invention is of great public utility, as it removes all danger from explosion of kerosene lamps to which it is attached. It is also a great convenience, as where it is used the glass chimney does not become heated at the bottom, and may be removed or adjusted with the bare hand.

"Since the invention, nearly all the burners in use embody its principles.

"Collins was several years in perfecting it, trying many experiments, and having numerous forms of chimneys and lamps constructed as experiments before he succeeded. He has used all due and reasonable diligence to obtain remuneration. But his invention has been extensively pirated, and he has been compelled to resort to constant and repeated suits. He has not kept accounts, but we are entirely satisfied that the receipts from sales of his patent have been exhausted thereby, and that he has received no remuneration beyond his expenses and a sum not exceeding, in all, $3,500.

"The extension will cause no perceptible burden upon the public. The royalty heretofore reserved has been 5 cents per dozen burners."

Mr. COCKRELL. This patent expired on the 19th day of September, 1882, nearly two years ago. It is for an article that is used by all laboring men throughout the United States, and in their interest I do not think we can dispose of the bill under the five-minute rule. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BRIDGE AT EAGLE PASS, TEX.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 51) to authorize the construction of a bridge for the transportation of street-cars, wagons, and other vehicles, horses and other animals, and pedestrians over the Rio Grande River, between the cities of Eagle Pass, Tex., and Piedras Negras, Mexico.

Mr. ALLISON. There seems to be no clause there respecting the authority to alter, amend, or repeal the act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The Secretary reports that there is a clause to that effect.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not hear it fully read or did not understand it exactly. I think it is not the usual clause. Allow it to be read again.

The Chief Clerk read section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That Congress reserves the right to withdraw the authority and power conferred by this act, in case the free navigation of said river shall at any time be substantially or materially obstructed by said bridge, or for any other reason, and to direct the removal or necessary modifications thereof at the cost and expense of the owners of said bridge; and Congress may at any time alter, repeal, or amend this act.

Mr. ALLISON. That will do. I did not hear it fully before.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Should not the right for a postal telegraph be reserved? It is usual to reserve the right to the Government for postal telegraphs over a bridge. I do not recollect whether that is inserted here or not.

Mr. COKE. I do not remember any such reservation, but I have no objection to an amendment that will make the reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will indicate the amendment he wishes to offer.

Mr. CONGER. I move to insert:

The right is reserved to the United States for the establishment of a postal telegraph across said bridge.

Let that be inserted at the end of the clause relative to repealing or amending the act.

Mr. MAXEY. I would call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the act of 1866. This bridge becomes, as all railroad bridges are, a post-route, and by the act of 1866 becomes also a postal telegraph route, the act which Congress then passed providing for certain control over telegraph lines by Congress.

Mr. COKE. But part of this bridge is within the jurisdiction of the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. MAXEY. I have no objection to the amendment, but I think it is already covered by the act already passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment already offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 4 it is proposed to add:

The right is reserved to the United States for the establishment of a postal telegraph across the said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the title be amended by striking out so much of it as is between the word "bridge" and the word "over." There is no need of having that long title repeated so many times. Let it read: "A bill to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Rio Grande River between the cities of Eagle Pass, Tex., and Piedras Negras, Mexico.

Mr. COKE. I see no objection to that amendment, adding, however, the words "and for other purposes," since the bill was amended relative to a telegraph line.

Mr. HOAR. It is only to authorize a bridge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out in the title the words:

For the transportation of street-cars, wagons, and other vehicles, horses and other animals, and pedestrians.

So that the title will read:

A bill to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Rio Grande River between the cities of Eagle Pass, Tex., and Piedras Negras, Mexico.

And also to add the words "and for other purposes."

Mr. HOAR. No, it is not necessary to add those words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title will stand in this form: "A bill to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Rio Grande River between the cities of Eagle Pass, Tex., and Piedras Negras, Mexico."

BRIDGE AT LAREDO, TEX.

The bill (S. 664) to authorize the construction of a bridge for the transportation of street cars and other vehicles, &c., over the Rio Grande River between the cities of Laredo, Tex., and Nueva Laredo, Mexico, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the same amendment be added to this bill that was added to the other bill, reserving the right as to a postal telegraph.

Mr. COKE. I accept that amendment. It is similar to the one offered to the last bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of section 4:

The right is reserved to the United States for the establishment of a postal telegraph across said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the title by adding the words "and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. The title ought to be amended as in the last bill by leaving out the surplusage.

Mr. CONGER. Let all after the word "bridge" be stricken out down to the word "over" and add "and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The title as amended was agreed to, so as to read: "A bill to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Rio Grande River between the cities of Laredo, Tex., and Nueva Laredo, Mexico."

JOHN H. WALKER.

Mr. CAMDEN. I ask to have the regular Calendar corrected in regard to the bill (S. 83) for the relief of John H. Walker, late a captain in the United States Army. The Calendar says that the bill was reported without amendment. It was reported with an amendment, an important amendment, and I ask that the Calendar state that the bill was reported with an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made.

WILLIAM P. RANDALL.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The bill (S. 76) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy was passed over a little while ago, I am informed, not to lose its place on the Calendar. I ask that it be taken up now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks the Senate to go back to Order of Business 224. If there be no objection the bill will be taken up.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments in line 7, after "the," to strike out "highest rate of;" and after the word "grade," in line 8, to insert "from the date of such appointment;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall, United States Navy, a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy, with the retired-pay of that grade from the date of such appointment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MILLER, of California, February 14:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 76) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy, beg leave to report the same to the Senate with the recommendation that the bill do pass amended as follows:

In line 7 strike out the words "highest rate," and at the end of line 8 insert "from the date of such appointment."

The reasons for this recommendation are correctly stated in a report made to the House of Representatives, Forty-seventh Congress, which is adopted by this committee, as follows:

"Lieutenant Randall has recently failed of recommendation for promotion to the grade of lieutenant-commander on the active-list because of physical infirmity wholly. But for these infirmities, which are mainly the direct results of hard and faithful service in war, Mr. Randall would have been unanimously recommended for promotion by the examining board.

"The record of this officer is an admirable one. The retired-list of the Navy was created and intended for the protection of just such men as Mr. Randall, and we could wish that it contained no names less worthy than his.

"Mr. Randall was an experienced navigator at the opening of the war of 1861, and was about to sail in command of a whaling ship at that time. He gave up his command, offered his services to the United States, and on the 24th of July, 1861, was appointed an acting master in the United States Navy. He was ordered to the Cumberland, and served on that vessel at the capture of Forts Clarke and Hatteras, and in the contest with the Merrimac, at Newport News, March 8, 1862, he was in command of the after pivot-gun, which was the last gun fired on the ship in that memorable contest. On the 28th of May, 1862, he was promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant, and served on the gunboat Port Royal through the summer of 1862. From January 26, 1863, he commanded the United States bark Pursuit until August 12, 1864, and from that date he commanded the United States bark Restless until February 23, 1865, when he took command of the United States steamer Hendrick Hudson, and remained in that command until March 9, 1865.

"On the 17th of March, 1865, he was promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant-commander. On the 19th of December, 1865, he was honorably discharged from the United States Navy with the rank of lieutenant-commander.

"On the 22d of November, 1866, he was appointed as acting master; March 12, 1868, he received a commission as ensign in the regular Navy, and was promoted as lieutenant March 11, 1870.

"Since that time Mr. Randall has served in that rank, and has rendered very valuable service to the Government, as appears by his record herewith reported. His record is without spot or stain. He was desirous of remaining on the active-list, but when the time for his promotion came he was found mentally and morally qualified, but physically disqualified, and was retired as a lieutenant. We think that his service and record entitle him to retirement as lieutenant-commander, the rank which he reached on his own merits and record in the volunteer service, and before he entered the regular Navy.

"In proof of his worth and merits as an officer, we append hereto a letter signed by members of the retiring board and other officers of the Navy. Such an indorsement ought to entitle Mr. Randall to favorable consideration.

"NAVAL RECORD.

"Lieut. William P. Randall was born in New Bedford, Mass. In 1861 was about to sail in command of a whale-ship when the war commenced; was furnished with a certificate signed by the president of every insurance office in the city, to the effect that their offices would insure any vessel under his command at the lowest rates of insurance; without further indorsement was appointed an acting master in the United States Navy, July 24, 1861, and ordered to the United States ship Cumberland, serving on that vessel at the capture of Forts Clarke and Hatteras, and afterward in the engagement with the Merrimac at Newport News, March 8, 1862, at which time he had command of the after pivot-gun (which was the last gun fired from that ship). May 28, 1862, promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant and ordered to the gunboat Port Royal, Commander George W. Morris, which vessel did good service on the James River through the summer of 1862, and joined the East Gulf Squadron in the fall of that year. January 26, 1863 (being at that time the executive officer), detached from the Port Royal and ordered to command the United States bark Pursuit; commanded this vessel until August 12, 1864, when he was detached and ordered to command the United States bark Restless. These vessels were engaged in blockading the coast of Florida, and while commanded by Lieutenant Randall did much injury to the enemy, for which he received two complimentary letters from the admiral commanding (Admiral Stribling), with orders to read them on the quarter-deck at muster.

"February 23, 1865, took temporary command of the United States steamer Hendrick Hudson (Restless undergoing repairs at Key West), and went to Saint Mark's for General Newton, United States Army, and staff, March 9, 1865. Promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant-commander March 17, 1865; detached from the United States bark Restless and ordered to take the prize-steamer Ruby to New York; arrived in New York with the Ruby April 14, 1865, and waited orders until August 17, 1865, when he was granted four months' leave of absence; on December 19, 1865, was honorably discharged from the United States Navy, with the rank of lieutenant-commander. October 30, 1866, presented himself to the examining board at Hartford, Conn., for admission to the regular service, and was rejected on account of injuries received in the line of duty during the engagement between the Cumberland and Merrimac, but obtained permission from Washington for examination. He presented himself the second time, November 22, 1866, and on December 7, 1866, received an appointment as acting master on temporary service, and was ordered to the United States steamer Peoria, which vessel went to the West Indies and returned with the yellow fever on board. Detached from her in Norfolk, Va., and went to the hospital July 29, 1867; was on sick-leave until September, 1867, when he was ordered to the United States receiving ship Ohio, March 12, 1868 (three years and three days after receiving his appointment as a volunteer lieutenant-commander).

"He received a commission as ensign in the regular Navy October 12, 1868. Detached from the Ohio and ordered to command the United States steamer Leyden December 18, 1863. Promoted to master January 27, 1869, and detached from the Leyden and orded to the United States steamer Narraganasett. Joined the Narragansett in Havana, March 17, 1869. In July the Narragansett went in quarantine at Portsmouth, N. H., with yellow fever on board, when he was detached and ordered to the Boston navy-yard. September 1, 1869, ordered to command the United States steamer Palos. In October, 1869, was detached from the Palos and took command of the United States steamer Leyden. Commissioned as lieutenant March 21, 1870. May 18, 1870, detached from the Leyden and ordered to the monitor Saugus. Joined the Saugus at Havana June 4, 1870. September 30, 1870, detached from the Saugus and ordered to command the United States steamer Mayflower. Detached from the Mayflower November 3, 1870, and ordered to the United States receiving-ship Ohio, navy-yard, Boston. May 5, 1871, temporarily detached from the Ohio and ordered to Key West, Fla., as executive officer, to assist in bringing the Saugus to Philadelphia. June 22, 1871, returned to the Ohio. September 15, detached from the Ohio and ordered to the United States steamer Iroquois. January 15, 1872, detached from the Iroquois and ordered to the United States steamer Canandaigua. August 4, 1874, detached from the Canandaigua at Key West, and sent home by medical survey (with Chagres fever) on sick-leave. November, 1874, ordered to the ordnance department, navy-yard, Boston. WASHINGTON CITY, February 17, 1882.

In consideration of the good record and long service of Lieut. William P. Randall, United States Navy, and as the disabilities that prevented his promotion on the active-list are physical and incurred in the line of duty, the undersigned believe that if he is placed on the retired-list of the Navy with the rank of lieutenant-commander it will be an act of justice to a deserving officer who held this rank during the late civil war.

Mr. COCKRELL. In the first part of the report made in the House of Representatives in the Forty-seventh Congress it is stated that—

Lieutenant Randall has recently failed of recommendations for promotion to the grade of lieutenant-commander on the active-list because of physical infirmity wholly. But for these infirmities, which are mainly the direct results of hard and faithful service in war, Mr. Randall would have been unanimously recommended for promotion by the examining board.

The naval record of Lieutentant Randall shows that—

March 1, 1881, ordered as member of a board to organize search for the steamer Jeannette. April 7, 1881, ordered to special duty under the Bureau of Navigation. Placed on the retired-list of the Navy February 15, 1882.

He was placed on the retired-list with the rank of lieutenant. Now that record, which ought to show whether there was any examining board, does not show any such thing. A lieutenant or any officer may be retired because of physical disability, regardless of whether promotion is ahead of him or not. He may be retired if he is ordered before a board for promotion and found physically unfit for it if the physical disability has resulted from incidents of the service. What is this case? Here is an officer who was retired because of physical disability, and now it is proposed to give him a higher grade on the retired-list.

But take the case as presented by the report and not by the record. It is a case where it is proposed because an officer was unfit physically for promotion that we shall give him that promotion nevertheless, but upon the retired-list.

This is a fruitful field of legislation. We have, I will say, fifty cases to-day pending here in the Senate before the Committees on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs to give increased rank upon the retired-list for the purpose of giving increased pay. Every officer in the Army who had nearly reached promotion, but was retired, wants to be kept on the active-list until he can receive that promotion and then be retired, or after he is retired he wants Congress to restore him to the position that he would have attained if he had been permitted to be promoted on the active-list. It is special legislation and of a very dangerous character.

Now, unless there is something to show that this naval record as given here is wrong, I shall be compelled to object to the consideration of the case.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that while this record, which is a mere record of the transfers of this officer and his service, does not show that he went before a board for examination for promotion, the Committee on Naval Affairs knows the fact to be that he was before such a board and did not receive his promotion because of physical infirmity which had been brought upon him by service in the war and since the war.

I went myself to the Navy Department to investigate this case, because I am as much opposed to placing officers upon the retired-list at a higher rank than they are entitled to as the Senator from Missouri or any other Senator, and the Committee on Naval Affairs has been especially careful in such cases. But this is one of the most meritorious officers in the service, as the brief record printed with the report testifies. I was informed at the Navy Department that this officer was regarded very highly; that he had rendered eminent services; that he had been sent before a board for examination for promotion; that he had been found to be color-blind and could not therefore receive his promotion. The opinion of officers of high rank at the Department was that he ought to have not only this rank but a higher rank for the eminent services he had rendered.

The fact that he was before a board for examination for promotion and was found physically incapacitated is stated here to be true. I know it from the investigation I made in the Department; and although I have not the record here before me at this time, the papers showing this fact having been sent over to the House committee from the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, I can state on my own responsibility that such is the fact. Then it is certified to here by the officers whose certificate is attached to the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from California if this lieutenant is also drawing a pension?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do not know about that; but I do not suppose he is, and I do not think he is drawing any pension. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says he is not.

Mr. DAWES. I think not.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I think not.

Mr. DAWES. I do not speak from absolute knowledge, but that is my impression.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am satisfied he is not drawing a pension. Admiral Worden and other officers of high rank, in the paper appended to the report, say:

WASHINGTON CITY, February 17, 1882.

In consideration of the good record and long service of Lieut. William P. Randall, United States Navy, and as the disabilities that prevented his promotion on the active-list are physical and incurred in the line of duty, the undersigned believe that if he is placed on the retired-list of the Navy with the rank of lieutenant-commander it will be an act of justice to a deserving officer who held this rank during the late civil war.

He is perfectly well known to all these officers. He is a man who by his long and faithful and eminent and gallant service is well known in the Navy and highly esteemed. The fact that he was before a board for examination for promotion is as well known to the Navy as any other fact in its history. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not object to the consideration of the bill, but will allow it to be acted upon, and I hope the Senate will pass it. I believe it is due to this officer on his special merits for his gallantry and good conduct and the intelligent, faithful, and honorable service which he has rendered to the country.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to add after the word "appointment" at the end of the bill the words "under the provisions of this act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is an amendment to an amendment not yet reached.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not doubt one solitary word that the distinguished Senator from California has said in regard to the gallantry, devotion, and patriotism of this officer. I concede that and more too, but I ask, has he done anything more than his duty in the respective positions he has occupied? Is the Senate to undertake to promote every officer in the Navy or in the Army according to the view of his services taken by the Senate? That is a dangerous policy.

I must insist upon having from the Navy Department the proceedings of that board which passed upon his qualifications for promotion. I know how easy it is to make statements of this kind. This record is made from the Navy Department; if he were ordered before a board for examination for promotion, it ought to have been in the record. I desire to have this bill passed over until we can have a copy directly from the Secretary of the Navy of the order calling that board and the proceedings of that board.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I agree to that very readily provided that the bill shall not lose its place on the Calendar, and if I do not produce that record then I shall not ask to have this bill favorably considered.

Mr. PLUMB. I feel constrained to object to this bill. I know that the reasons sought to be applied in this case by this bill can not be applied uniformly to a person who has served in the Army or Navy. I introduced a bill myself at an early day in the session to secure a substantially similar result for a man who had lost an arm in the Army, and who I thought was as meritorious as the record shows this man to be—not any more so, because I am not willing to have any degrees of comparison in regard to this matter of merit where men have incurred disability in the line of duty. But there are inequalities which we can not reach, and it seems to me that we are simply aggravating the situation by taking up some cases where the proper amount of solicitation is brought to bear, or where parties seeking the aid come under the personal observation of Senators, and therefore have become an exception to the rule. We are simply entering, if we do this, upon an unending system of legislation which, while it is good enough in some sense, at the same time aggravates discriminations already existing against others. I am the more certain about this as far as my own action goes because I have been observant of the inequalities that attach to the Army service and the inequalities that exist now in regard to the rewards which have been given to those who served the country faithfully during the war, and unless I feel sure that there is a way to remedy all the inequalities of every kind and description—and they are as various as human experience can possibly make them—I am in favor of leaving them where we find them and applying some general rule, and only a general rule, which shall take up the majority of them and leave the special cases exactly where we find them.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] suggests, in the shape of a criticism of what I say, that because I can not do all I will not do anything. I am willing to stand even by that, because every time we do anything of that kind we add to the injustice which is already existing on the part of somebody else.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator does not object to making special provision for pensions?

Mr. PLUMB. No. I do not make special reference to that system because that is based upon disability, and this is not based upon disability, or if it is based upon disability it gives to this man a greater reward than his rank entitled him to; and that is what we do not do in other cases.

Mr. DAWES. The bill is based on the disability which prevented the promotion which he would otherwise have had.

Mr. PLUMB. There are undoubtedly cases, large numbers of them, where during the war a man by reason of his misfortune in losing an arm did not get promoted as he ought to have been. If we are going to search them all out, let it be done in some way whereby there shall be a rule which will operate by way of general law. I do not know that I should object to that; but I can not vote to take one man who happens to present himself saying "I would have been promoted if it had not been for some disability" and not a disability incurred by reason of exposure——

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator really say that he will not do anything in this way toward righting wrong, because he can not do it all?

Mr. PLUMB. This is not a wrong. I say simply that we are doing a vain thing, an idle thing, because we are not touching upon the real difficulty. We are wasting our time in seeking out particular cases when we ought to adopt a general rule; and what we do in this case is substantially a reflection upon other equally meritorious cases. I am not myself willing to engage in legislation of that kind.

Mr. DAWES. It can not be that. It can not be any reflection upon other men. It is only an honest effort upon our part as the cases present themselves to dispose of them properly.

Mr. PLUMB. But the case does not present itself. The man presents his own case, and the great mass of the cases which are presented according to the theory with which we deal in legislation do not receive consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kansas has expired.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas objects to the further consideration of the bill and it goes over.

THOMAS G. CORBIN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 427) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to have the latter part of the bill read again. I want to hear it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it would be well to have the bill printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois desires the reading of the latter part of the bill again.

The Chief Clerk read section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to said Thomas G. Corbin, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the difference of pay to which he would have been entitled had he been promoted on the active-list in the regular order of seniority, and been retired as rear-admiral on attaining the age of 62 years; and a sufficient sum for the purpose, to be computed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, is hereby appropriated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] objects to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I want to ask a question.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the objection for a moment.

Mr. LOGAN. I want to ask the Committee on Naval Affairs if this bill had consideration in that committee and was reported by a unanimous recommendation of the committee?

Mr. McPHERSON. I will first state to the Senator from Illinois that the committee have reported the bill back with amendments which the Secretary has not yet read. It has been reported by the Naval Committee; I can not say whether it was a unanimous report.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state the reason why I inquire if there is any amendment to the bill. If there is, I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "of," in line 4 of section 2, it is proposed to insert "shore;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to said Thomas G. Corbin, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the difference of shore-pay to which he would have been entitled had he been promoted on the active-list in the regular order of seniority and been retired as rear-admiral on attaining the age of 62 years; and a sufficient sum for the purpose, to be computed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to be understood as in the slightest degree desiring to criticise the Committee on Naval Affairs; nothing would be more foreign to my taste than to do that; but I must say that this is one of the most remarkable bills I have ever heard read in the Senate. Here a captain on the retired-list is to be promoted to rear-admiral because possibly he might have been a rear-admiral if he had not been retired. He might have been dismissed from the service; there might have been a hundred things done to him. The idea that we shall legislate on the probability of a man acquiring a certain position that he never has acquired is the most absurd proposition I ever heard suggested before the Congress of the United States. The other day a bill was introduced here to retire a gentleman, put him on the retired-list of the Army with the rank of colonel, because he would have attained that rank if he had remained in the service. I turned to the Army Register and I found that the major just above him was a major still. How he would have got over that major and become a colonel I never could understand. That is the idea that this bill conveys; and not only that, this man was retired as a captain, but you propose now to retire him as a rear-admiral because probably or possibly he would have become a rear-admiral if nothing had happened to him during the time between his retirement as a captain and some other period.

But not only do you retire him as a rear-admiral, but you give him back-pay as a rear-admiral because something might have happened to produce results that would have put him on the retired-list as a rear-admiral. I do think that if committees of the Senate intend to report bills of that character to the Senate they ought to be severely criticised hereafter, for there is no reason or foundation whatever for a bill of this sort being reported by a committee to the Senate. We are not legislating on probabilities or possibilities, or something that may transpire in the future or might have transpired in the past. Under the law applicable to both Navy and Army officers they are required to be retired with the rank they hold at the time of the retirement; and there is no rule that can be established other than that which will do justice to all of the officers. Any other rule will be taking one out occasionally and jumping him over everybody else, and giving him pay that he never would have received to the end of his days probably if he had staid in the Navy all that time.

Now, go to work and figure to see how he would become a rear-admiral, and tell me how he would have got over all the men that rank him now and ranked him then, that are not yet rear-admirals. Then tell me how he would have become a rear-admiral by this time. I should like to understand that proposition.

I merely make this suggestion to the committee that at least we may have this question considered when bills of this kind come before us as to the possibilities.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think if the Senator from Illinois had correctly understood the bill and the object and the purport of it, he probably would not have made the speech he has just made. From a mere reading of the bill perhaps he would have the right to draw a conclusion that the Committee on Naval Affairs intended to jump a man from the grade of captain to that of rear-admiral without any reason whatever.

Mr. LOGAN. No.

Mr. McPHERSON. But, Mr. President, there is something to be said in defense of this bill, and I think the committee were fully justified in making the report they did. Perhaps it would expedite matters very much if the report which I had the honor to make were presented to the Senate and read for the edification of the Senate before proceeding to make any remarks myself upon the question.

The Senator states that this legislation should be in perfect accordance with the rights and the justice due to the officer. If I fail to show before this case is decided that this bill does no more than award perfect justice, only justice, to this officer, then I shall submit that the Senator is right and I am wrong. I ask to have the report read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. McPHERSON February 14, 1884:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 427) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin, have fully considered the same, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The facts in this case are well stated and fully set forth in the following report made by the Committee on Naval Affairs of this body in the Forty-seventh Congress:

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 14) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin, have duly considered the same, and beg leave to submit the following report:

"The bill proposes to authorize the President of the United States to restore Thomas G. Corbin, now a captain on the retired-list of the Navy, to the active-list, to take rank next after Commodore J. W. A. Nicholson, with restitution, from December 12, 1873, of the difference of pay between that of a commodore on the active-list on waiting-orders pay and that of a captain retired on half-pay.

"The act of April 21, 1864, 'to amend an act entiled "An act to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862,' provides—"'That no line officer of the Navy upon the active-list below the grade of commodore, nor any other naval officer, shall be promoted to a higher grade until his mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform all his duties at sea shall be established to the satisfaction of a board of examining officers to be appointed by the President of the United States. And such board shall have power to take testimony, the witnesses, when present, to be sworn by the president of the board, and to examine all matter on the files and records of the Department in relation to any officer whose case shall be considered by them.

"'SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That such examining board shall consist of not less than three officers senior in rank to the officer to be examined.

"'SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any officer, to be acted upon by said board, shall have the right to be present, if he desires it; and his statement of his case on oath, and the testimony of witnesses, and his examination, shall be recorded. And any matter on the files and records of the Department touching each case, as may, in the opinion of the board, be necessary to assist them in making up their opinion, shall, together with the whole record and finding, be presented to the President for his approval or disapproval of the finding. And no officer shall be rejected until after such public examination of himself and the records of the Department in his case, unless he fails to appear before said board after having been duly notified.'

"The whole case narrows down to a simple interpretation of the true intent and meaning of the sections just quoted.

"Your committee have carefully examined Captain Corbin's history while in the naval service, and find that his record is unexceptionable and without blemish. He was appointed acting midshipman in 1838, and passed through all the intermediate grades of the service, having acquitted himself in a most meritorious and gallant manner throughout the entire war, and in July, 1866, was promoted to the rank of captain.

"On the 21st day of May, 1873, Captain Corbin was ordered to report in Washington to Rear-Admiral Rodgers for examination preliminary to promotion. In obedience thereto he appeared before the examining board, and was referred to the medical board for physical examination. This board examined and recommended him as physically qualified for promotion. He was then informed by the examining board that he would be required to submit to an oral examination to test his proficiency in the knowledge of his profession. He refused to submit to this oral examination on the ground that it was entirely beyond the purview of the act of April 21, 1864, and declined to appear before the board. Captain Corbin was thereupon discharged from further attendance before the board, who submitted a report to the Secretary of the Navy refusing to recommend him for promotion. The Secretary then offered him an opportunity to reconsider his determination not to appear before the examining board, of which privilege he again declined to avail himself. The papers in the case were then, by request of Captain Corbin, placed before the President, who sustained the action of the Department. Captain Corbin still declining to appear before the board for the purpose of an oral examination, on January 5, 1874, he was, by order of the Secretary of the Navy, placed upon the retired-list. This is the sum and substance of the whole case.

"Your committee, after maturely examining the act of April 21, 1864, are of the opinion that it leaves it optional with the officer to be present or absent during the examination. The act simply intended the ascertainment of an officer's fitness, mentally, morally, and professionally, by examination of witnesses and records. The framers of the act could not have meant to subject an officer like Captain Corbin, who had served his country faithfully and gallantly for thirty-five years, to the humiliation of an oral examination before he could receive that promotion which he so eminently deserved. Such an examination of young midshipmen about entering the Navy or of clerks about entering one of the Government Departments might be proper enough, but to require a person of the age and service of Captain Corbin to submit to such a thing would be unfair and unjust in every respect.

"The following letter from Hon. G. V. FOX, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Navy (who shaped and administered the act of April 21, 1864), to Senator EDMUNDS, explains the intent of this law:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I inclose Senate Report No. 743 and House Report No. 116, Forty-sixth Congress, third session, in reference to the case of Capt. T. G. Corbin, United States Navy. I am able to write to you with confidence that the conclusions of these two committees as to the true meaning of section 3 of the act of April 21, 1864, agree with the intent of the Navy Department, which shaped and administered this law.

The act of July 16, 1862, neither required nor permitted the presence of any officer whose case was pending. This was made a subject of complaint by those who suffered from the action of the board; but it was more specious than valid, because the true measure of merit entitling an officer of the senior grades to promotion is not an oral examination, but the record of his whole career on the files of the Navy Department as established by himself. The inefficient clamored to be present because before a board, where there was no public prosecutor, they hoped to exert a personal and sympathetic influence. They reasoned well, and the authors of section 3, act of April 21, 1864, offset it by requiring that those who chose to be present should be "examined," and the board were also required to use "any matter on the files and records of the Department touching each case."

This is the briefest explanation I can give you of the two acts referred to, and the reasons for putting in the option of being present. This legislation was for the purpose of raising the spirit of the Navy by removing from the active-list the drunkards and imbeciles. It had no reference to and was not intended to act upon officers whose record was blameless.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. V. FOX.

Hon. GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"Under section 4 of the act of July 16, 1862, no interrogation of officers upon professional subjects was ever made, because their professional reputation was satisfactorily established by the records of the Department and testimony of witnesses. A similar interpretation of section 3 of the act of 1864 was doubtless intended; otherwise that act would never have given the candidate for promotion the option of appearing or not appearing before the examining board. It requires his presence before the board of naval surgeons to ascertain his physical fitness, but it leaves his mental, moral, and professional qualifications to be ascertained from the files of the Department and the testimony of his brother officers. The evidence from that source is very complimentary to Captain Corbin, and can be referred to if desired in the papers accompanying the bill. Rear-Admiral C. H. Davis, Commodore C. R. P. Rodgers, and Capt. D. M. Fairfax, United States Navy, in answer to interrogatories propounded by the Navy Department relative to Captain Corbin, state that his reputation is the very best and that his habits are excellent, and they all pronounce him as well qualified in every respect for promotion. Commodore Rodgers says in his statement that 'he,' referring to Captain Corbin, 'is one of the ablest officers in the Navy,' and in answer to the question, 'Would you, as a commander of a squadron, have sufficient confidence in Captain Corbin to send him on an important separate service in command of a vessel of war?' says, 'I would. I should esteem myself happy in having such an officer to send on any service.'

"Commodore Rodgers was also asked this question: 'Do you, or not, consider Captain Corbin to be mentally, morally, and professionally a fit officer to perform all his duties at sea in a higher grade?' And his answer was, 'I do so consider him eminently qualified.'

"It was the duty of the examining board to summon reliable witnesses to testify as to whether in their opinion, based on actual knowledge of and contact with Captain Corbin, he was mentally, morally, and professionally qualified to fill a higher rank than the one he held. It was also its duty to call upon the Department for all the papers connected with his naval career, to examine them carefully to see whether he had ever been charged with conduct unbecoming an officer, or whether he had ever been guilty of intemperance, and when it had done that its power ended, it could go no further, and it was its duty to either recommend or not recommend him for promotion, as the evidence might justify, and any examination beyond this was a usurpation of power totally unwarranted by law. That Captain Corbin was a brave, honest, intelligent, and reputable naval officer there is no doubt; neither is there a doubt but that he was unjustly dealt with in being placed upon the retired-list without cause.

"Being satisfied as to his entire fitness for promotion, your committee report the bill back to the Senate without amendment, and recommend its passage."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 1372) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who has charge of the bill just laid before the Senate does not propose to go on with it at present in antagonism to the naval appropriation bill, and I rise for the purpose of moving to take up the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine, pending the unfinished business, moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I rise pending that to a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair laid before the Senate at the close of the session of yesterday Senate bill No. 1372, stating as I remember that he laid before the Senate the first of the special orders. My understanding of the matter is different from that of the Chair. My understanding is that the first special order was what is called the pleuro-pneumonia bill. That was the special order for the 10th of March, while the bankruptcy bill was a special order for a time about one week later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bankruptcy bill was made a special order on the 6th day of March last; the bill to regulate practice in patent suits was made a special order on the 7th of March; the bill to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia, &c., was made a special order on the 10th of March; and the bill to remove certain burdens from the American merchant marine, &c., was made a special order on the 1st of April. The rule in respect of special orders is as follows:

1. Any subject may, by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present, be made a special order; and when the time so fixed for its consideration arrives, the Presiding Officer shall lay it before the Senate unless there be unfinished business of the preceding day; and if it is not finally disposed of on that day, it shall take its place on the Calendar of Special Orders, in the order of time at which it was made special, unless it shall become by adjournment the unfinished business.

2. When two or more special orders have been made for the same time they shall have precedence according to the order in which they were severally assigned, and that order shall only be changed by direction of the Senate.

The Chair, after much consideration and without reference to any of these special orders, thought that the true interpretation of the rule as it reads was that the special orders, when there was an accumulation of them, were to be laid before the Senate in the order of time at which the Senate had directed them to be special orders, and not in the order of time for which they were fixed.

Mr. PLUMB. But that would seem to reverse the order of the Senate. The Senate had ordered that the measures should be considered in a certain order of time, and to that extent had given preference to the pleuro-pneumonia bill because it fixed an earlier period of time for its consideration. The decision of the Chair simply reverses the determination of the Senate to give early consideration to the pleuro-pneumonia bill, and fixes a later day for the consideration of that bill than the bankruptcy bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has seen the force of that argument; but after mature consideration and study of the new rules and the practice of the Senate, the Chair is clearly of opinion that as the rule stands the order of precedence depends upon the time when the Senate thinks the subject of sufficient importance to specially consider it, and not upon the day for which it was assigned, if the accumulation is such that all of them finally fall upon one day.

Mr. PLUMB. Then let me make a suggestion to the Chair. Take the case of a bill which has been made a special order at a time prior to the one under consideration, but the day for the consideration had not yet arrived. What would become of that special order in the course of the proceeding of the Senate under the construction of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presumes that in a case where the day for the consideration of the order had not arrived the bill would not be before the Senate at all; but the rule provides that if the special orders severally assigned are not disposed of they shall be taken up in the order at which, not for which, they were assigned. So the Chair has felt obliged, after careful consideration, in obedience to the rule, to hold that the special order first made, without reference to the time for which it was assigned, when all of them have run into one mass and the time for all has gone by, is first to be laid before the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. If the Chair pleases, it is somewhat immaterial as to the order, because the same rule provides that by direction of the Senate any other special order may take the place of the one which is first in order; and I give notice that I shall antagonize the shipping bill with any special order except an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course as the rule stands it is perfectly competent for a majority of the Senate, and without debate, to select which of several special orders the time specially assigned for which has passed the Senate will first consider; but it is the duty of the Chair to administer the written law of the Senate as it seems to read, and the Chair being of opinion, after careful study, that there was no other construction that could be put consistently with the language upon this rule, yesterday evening laid before the Senate the special order that the Senate had first made such.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I desire to ask if the Chair took into consideration the fact that the pleuro-pneumonia bill had been once taken up and debate had begun upon it, and that upon the succeeding day it was laid aside for the consideration of a joint resolution in regard to the same subject, which was discussed for several days, and that when the joint resolution had finally passed, before it had passed even, the time had arrived when the educational bill, which had been made a special order, was to be considered, and which was then laid before the Senate? That was the method in which the pleuro-pneumonia bill was displaced by the special order, the educational bill intervening before its consideration had been completed. I thought perhaps that state of facts had escaped the attention of the Chair at the time.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon the Chair, he will reply to the inquiry of the Senator from New York. The Chair will state that it had not escaped the attention of the Chair, but the pleuro-pneumonia bill having been under consideration and its consideration having been passed from, it was not left as the unfinished business for the next day and was not laid before the Senate. Its privileges as unfinished business under consideration, therefore, the Chair thinks, were waived, and the best that could be done for it next, which was open to some doubt, would be to let it be restored to its place as a special order.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. About that time it will be remembered that the question as to whether an unfinished business required to be laid before the Senate from day to day in order to hold its place was decided adversely by the Chair, I think, and the Chair decided upon a discussion of the matter that it was not necessary that an unfinished business should be laid before the Senate from day to day in order to hold its place, as had been the custom. For instance, when coming out of executive session before adjournment the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] had repeatedly, when he had charge of the new rules of the Senate when they were pending, requested the Chair to lay them before the Senate immediately after coming out of executive session and just before adjournment, in order that that business might hold its place. That question coming up, if I remember correctly, the Chair then decided that that course was not necessary under the new rules, that a measure would hold its place without being thus laid before the Senate.

Therefore I was surprised yesterday evening when the Chair took occasion to lay before the Senate the bankruptcy bill as the first special order; but as the Senate was just adjourning it was impossible for me to call the attention of the Chair to it. I have no desire to antagonize the consideration of the bankruptcy bill. I had not expected, however, that it would take this position. I had fully expected that the pleuro-pneumonia bill would be laid before the Senate as the unfinished business, because its date for consideration was an earlier date than that fixed for the consideration of the bankruptcy bill.

I knew that there were two bills, the bill in regard to patents, which was made a special order at the same time with the pleuro-pneumonia bill, but I had no doubt that the Patent Committee would consent that that bill might be laid over for the time being and that the pleuro-pneumonia bill would take the preference. But I did not expect any contest between the bankruptcy bill and the pleuro-pneumonia bill, and I have no desire to have any conflict. I prefer to get along without it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from New York that he is reminded by the gentlemen at the desk, and now remembers it, that the bill which was under consideration at the time referred to by the Senator from New York was the House bill, which never has been made a special order at all, and which being superseded by other business fell back to its place upon the Calendar. The Senate bill on the same subject was made a special order.

The Chair will further state, in respect of unfinished business not being laid before the Senate from day to day on an adjournment, that the present occupant of the Chair is not aware of having decided that it was not necessary unless where an executive session took place. The Chair has always thought, and still thinks, that it is not necessary to lay the unfinished business, when the executive session is followed by an immediate adjournment, again before the Senate, because it stands as unfinished business, action upon it being simply suspended while the Senate, on a question of order or any other interlocutory motion, is considering the kind of business that the rules provide may be considered pending any legislative measure. But the Chair is not aware that he has ever decided that if in the legislative action of the Senate unfinished business be laid aside and other matter be taken up on which the Senate adjourns unfinished, there can be two bills as unfinished business, or that the bill which was laid aside would be before the Senate under the regular order on the next day unless the regular order was called up before adjournment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to make an inquiry. What does the record show?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; for the question which the Senator desires to put to the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to know simply what the record shows, for my recollection is that we were considering the cattle bill, and when the hour for the consideration of the educational bill arrived it would be announced that the cattle bill was informally laid aside without prejudice, to be taken up as soon as we got through with the educational bill. That is my recollection. I have not examined the record to see what it shows.

Mr. HOAR. There is no Senator who would be more scrupulous to preserve any understanding which has been made than the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], or the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS], who are specially interested in the pleuro-pneumonia bill, I am sure; but at the same time it is true that when the pleuro-pneumonia bill was laid aside it was in the first instance laid aside for a resolution relating to the same subject in the charge of that committee which they thought required instant attention, and the friends of the other business pending consented that that should go on with the understanding, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] stated on the floor afterward, that the giving precedence to that resolution satisfied the claim of the general bill which was then pending, that they did not get that advantage and hold on to their bill at the same time. The Senator from New York did not so understand it, but I merely suggest for his consideration that some of us did. I know he did not so understand it.

What I wish to say is that it would be a great pity to have these three bills, or any two of them, put in a position of antagonism to each other. I am a friend of the shipping bill; I am a friend of the bankruptcy bill, which is in my charge as far as a Senator has charge of any matter under our customs; and I expect to follow the lead of my honorable friend from New York on the pleuro-pneumonia bill. I do not know what particular detail may be in it which ought to be corrected or amended.

I think that we can by a conference among ourselves have an understanding about these bills. I am sure my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] would very much regret if it should turn out that he had displaced the bankruptcy bill and defeated its chance of passage at this session, a bill which he is in favor of, for a mere discussion of the whole tariff policy of this country on the shipping bill, nothing actually coming from that, and I should feel very badly if I had interfered with my honorable friend from Maine with regard to his shipping bill without doing any good to the bankruptcy bill, or even if I did do any good to the bankruptcy bill.

I think, therefore, as to-day and to-morrow undoubtedly the appropriation bill will take precedence of all of us, we had better let these things stand as they are, and endeavor by a private conference, without detaining the Senate, to make an arrangement to which we can all three agree.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I had no intention of antagonizing——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York will pardon the Chair for a moment, as the Senator from Kentucky desired to know what appeared by the record. The Chair has now the minutes, which show that on the 12th of March, the morning business being through, House bill 3967, being the House animal pleuro-pneumonia bill, was in the morning hour, and before 2 o'clock, taken up. It was considered until 2 o'clock arrived, when the special order, being the bill for the restoration of Fitz-John Porter to the Army, came up, and consequently the House bill, the only one yet ever before the Senate for consideration, fell back to its place upon the Calendar.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I will simply say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I had no intention of antagonizing the bankruptcy bill with the pleuro-pneumonia bill, but I was disappointed in the decision of the Chair and I only desired to arrive at a full understanding of what the decision was and what it was based upon. I am entirely willing to abide by that and to take up the bills in the order indicated by the Chair, which will give the bankruptcy bill the first place among the special orders. The pleuro-pneumonia bill and the patent bill will then come together and there will have to be a decision between them; and the shipping bill will come afterward. I am entirely willing to abide by that decision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent, and the Chair thought it fit that it should proceed in order to an understanding of the operation of the rule. Pending the consideration of the bankruptcy bill, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that the Senator from Maine asked unanimous consent to lay aside the bankruptcy bill informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was not the way in which the Senator from Maine stated it.

Mr. HOAR. He will ask for that consent now.

Mr. HALE. My only desire is to get the bill up, and I am willing to get it up in any way that suits the Senator. I ask unanimous consent to lay aside the bankruptcy bill and to take up the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine withdraws his motion and asks unanimous consent to lay aside the bankruptcy bill in order to proceed with the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BECK. Let me understand that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question again. The Senator from Maine withdraws his motion and asks unanimous consent that the bankruptcy bill may be laid aside informally, so that the Senate may take up the naval appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BECK. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a statement. The naval appropriation bill by all the rules and precedents of the Senate has precedence over any special order, by a majority vote when it is asked for, and I make the objection for the purpose of having the test made whether the naval appropriation bill shall not have precedence as a matter of right by a vote of the Senate.

While I am on the floor I desire to say that the naval appropriation bill is not a mere appropriation bill to be passed over pro forma as ordinary appropriation bills usually are, but the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate has seen fit to re-enact in this bill a measure that the Senate passed some time ago, which is now pending in the other House, for the building of seven additional steel cruisers. It has also taken up the question of finishing the monitors, and it has taken up a great many important questions; it has added, in other words, over $6,000,000 to the bill as it came from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kentucky that the debate proceeds by unanimous consent. The Chair assumes that there is no objection.

Mr. BECK. I wish to make only another remark for the purpose of showing why I desire to have precedence for the naval appropriation bill. It is because of its importance and because of the important questions that are involved in it; and I desire to say further that, as the Chair has very well stated, the day fixed for all these special orders having passed and the shipping bill having been made a special order for last Friday, standing upon the same footing with the others, the whole question of American shipping, of the sailors we are to have in the future, whether in the Navy or in the merchant marine, the guns we are to have, and everything connected with the policy of our shipping interests is necessarily involved in the naval appropriation bill in the shape that it has now assumed, and the shipping bill will have to be considered almost as a part of it; and I hope the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will insist that the shipping bill shall come up immediately after it, because it is now really a part of the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to laying it aside, the bankruptcy bill is before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Then I shall insist——

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make an observation called for by the observation which the Senate unanimously permitted the Senator from Kentucky to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the debate will be permitted to go on.

Mr. HOAR. The Senate has expressed its desire to have these bills stand in a certain order under its rules. The Senate always accords to the Committee on Appropriations the courtesy of taking up (no Senator who has any matter in his charge objects to their taking up) what the Committee on Appropriations desire. Now, if the members of that committee, when it is proposed to give unanimous consent, so that the will of the Senate may be interfered with as little as possible, to let them take up an appropriation bill, come in with single objections, it is using the courtesy which the Senate extends to them in an outrageous and tyrannical manner, in my judgment.

Mr. HALE. Why does the Senator say that members of the committee do so? That is personal.

Mr. HOAR. I stated it in regard to the objection made. It is an outrageous perversion of the courtesy of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that in my judgment the language of the Senator from Massachusetts is outrageous and tyrannical and is wholly unworthy of anybody but him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that both the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts and those of the Senator from Kentucky are not in order.

Mr. HALE. Now I wonder if we can not take up the naval appropriation bill by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That depends upon whether the debate which is proceeding by unanimous consent is terminated. The Chair can not put the question until the debate has terminated, which is going on by unanimous consent. [A pause.] The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill. [Having put the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for a division.

There were on a division—ayes 34, noes 2; no quorum voting.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a second?

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the demand for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The division taken has shown that no quorum has voted. The Chair under the rules must either order a call of the Senate, which the rules expressly require, or, according to its custom, take the yeas and nays, or by unanimous consent count the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Let the latter be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will count the Senate. [A pause.] There are forty Senators present. A quorum is present. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. PLUMB. I submit the following resolution to be referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Rule XXXIII be amended by adding after the words "The heads of Departments," in the seventh line of the rule as printed for the use of the Senate, the following: "including the Commissioner of Agriculture."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules, if there be no objection.

Mr. FRYE. I should prefer that that be not referred, but that it lie over, so that the Senate may vote upon it and express its opinion. That question has been before the Committee on Rules twice already, and of course the committee would be glad to be governed by the wishes of the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the resolution may lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

COURTS IN NORTHERN NEW YORK.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has consented that I may submit a motion in regard to a bill on the Calendar, which will occupy no time. The bill (H. R. 1090) to amend the Revised Statutes, establishing the times, places, and provisions for holding terms of the district court in the northern district of New York, was reported by me on the 10th of March from the Committee on the Judiciary. I submit a motion that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary for the purpose of further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4705) in relation to courts and judicial proceedings in the Territories; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the bill be considered with the amendments of the committee first; that is, that the reported amendments be acted on in their order as they are reached in the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent, as the Chair understands, that the bill be read by sections, and that the amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations be considered in order as they are reached in the reading.

Mr. ALLISON. It should be considered by paragraphs, and not by sections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa suggests that the reading of the bill proceed by paragraphs, and that the amendments of the committee shall be considered as they are reached. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 57, after the word "orders," to insert "which shall specify the special necessity for such travel;" so as to read:

For two secretaries, one to the Admiral and one to the Vice-Admiral, clerks to paymasters, clerks at inspections, navy-yards, and stations, and extra pay to men enlisted under honorable discharge; commission and interest, transportation of funds, exchange; mileage to officers while traveling under orders in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers while traveling abroad under orders, which shall specify the special necessity for such travel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, in line 58, after the word "travel," to strike out "and for traveling expenses of apothecaries, yeoman, and civilian employés."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, after the word "thereof," in line 82, to increase the appropriation from $375,000 to $410,000 for the various items stated in the clause.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to know the necessity for that. Three hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars appear to have been all the pay that was considered necessary originally in the bill. I should like to know the apparent necessity that exists for an increase to $410,000.

Mr. HALE. The House of Representatives has changed——
Mr. BECK. If the Senator from Maine will allow me——
Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. There are quite a number of amendments running through the first pages of this bill as to which the same question might very well be asked. Perhaps it would be well for the Senator from Maine now, as this is a somewhat important amendment, to make a statement that may prevent the asking of a good many other questions in reference to the increases, by referring to the estimates, the information, the urgent demand, and the reasons given for those increases. I suggest that to him now. Perhaps it will save trouble.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if it would take any longer for the chairman of the committee were he to make the necessary explanation in each case as we reach it, without going through the whole of them at one time?

Mr. HALE. It is rather my fashion on appropriation bills, instead of making any extended remarks beforehand, to wait until some question arises and then try to give the explanation. It is very simple about this matter.

The House of Representatives changed the classification of the contingency item, found on lines 100 to 104, and the general item, found on lines 50 to 99. The appropriations last year for these two items were $300,000 and $100,000, respectively, making $400,000 in the aggregate. There is a deficiency under that appropriation of $48,645.29, in round numbers nearly $50,000. The Department does not object to changing the classification, but does not wish to be restricted to a sum less than it can do the business with, and asks that the two appropriations be made, $425,000 and $25,000, making $450,000 in all, so as to escape a deficiency. The Committee on Appropriations has not gone so far as that, but believes on examination of the items that $410,000 will do for this item, with $25,000 for the item on page 5, aggregating $435,000, where the Department asks for $450,000 and where last year it was necessary to expend $450,000.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps it is proper that I should explain why I made the suggestion I did. I am content that it should be done in the way suggested by the chairman of the subcommittee. This bill as reported makes very many important changes. Perhaps there will be a good many as to which no Senator will ask any question as the Senator from New Jersey asked in regard to the pending amendment. When a question is not asked the action taken by the committee is assumed to be correct, and the amendment is agreed to; and nothing appears upon the record as to the reason why that change was made. The bill as thus amended goes to the House of Representatives. There a non-concurrence is moved. The House never sees it. There is no reason given why the changes were made or the increases proposed, and the whole thing at last narrows itself down to a committee of conference without a single fact upon the record to show why the Senate made the changes it did make.

I insist that the Senate is always stronger when it appears upon record so that every man at both ends of the Capitol can see why changes are made, why increases are had, so that all shall not be confided to a committee of conference at last who will never perhaps lay the facts before the two Houses.

It was for that reason, and for that reason only, that I made the suggestion I did, because if the Senator from Maine only makes explanations when some Senator asks for an explanation many important matters may be passed over without a word in the RECORD to show why the subcommittee acted, of which I had the honor to be a member, and why the whole committee acted that perhaps would be conclusive upon the members of both Houses if the facts were made a part of the record.

I confess to having lost in the last year a good deal of the faith in conference committees that I once had. I want as little done there as possible, and I wish the two Houses themselves to see the ground upon which the conference committees see fit to act.

Mr. HALE. All this lays entirely in the power of the Senate. Whenever amendments are reached or clauses not amended that any Senator desires information upon, the Appropriations Committee will endeavor to furnish the reasons for its action.

I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that a vast body of power is always committed to conference committees. Perhaps what mitigates that as much as anything is the fact that it has fallen about in our practice that the conferees appointed are almost always those on appropriation bills who have been engaged in making up the bill, the subcommittee which takes charge of the bill and knows more about all the reasons for the action of the committee and of the Senate than anybody else. They are less likely to be misled by an ignorance of the facts, and so far as that goes it does qualify and reconcile somewhat to the vast power lodged in conference committees. I do not know of any other way we can do business finally in closing up a session and getting rid of what is before us than to give this power to conference committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the same clause, to strike out from line 84 to line 101, in the following words:

And all officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers, clerks, or enlisted men in the regular or volunteer army or navy, or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous and in the regular Navy, in the grade having graduated pay held by such officer at the time of the passage of this act; and the record of all service of every such officer shall be entered in full, opposite his name, in the appropriate columns of the Navy Register, in the same manner as service in the regular Navy is credited: Provided, That nothing in this clause shall be so constructed as to authorize any change in the dates of commission or in the relative rank of such officers: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give any additional or longevity pay to any such officer during the time of his service in the volunteer army or navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 106, to increase the appropriation from $15,000 to $25,000 "for all emergencies and extraordinary expenses arising at home or abroad but impossible to be anticipated or classified, exclusive of personal services in the Navy Department or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Before going to the next bureau, rather in the line of the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], as explaining the action of the committee on the items already gone over, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury of the Second Comptroller, and also the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury explaining the paragraph just struck out. I presume there will be no objection to their being printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 1, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the communication from your committee of the 14th ultimo, in which you request an examination of the provisions contained in H. R. 4716, lines 82 to 99, inclusive, relative to crediting officers of the Navy with former service in the Army or Navy, with a view to ascertaining the probable expenditure from the Treasury to carry the same into effect.

In reply thereto I have the honor to inclose herewith a report of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury on the subject, together with copies of all rulings and decisions of the accounting officers, and opinion of the Attorney-General, bearing upon the provisions relating to the same subject in the naval appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1883 and 1884.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1884.

SIR: By Department reference of the 15th ultimo I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of the inclosed letter addressed to you by direction of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the United States Senate, together with a copy of naval appropriation bill (H. R. 4716), requesting an estimate of any increased expenditure required to carry the said bill into effect, and asking copies of all rulings and decisions of the accounting officers of the Treasury and any opinions of the Attorney-General which may have been rendered upon the provisions relating to the same subject in the naval appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1883 and 1884, respectively.

Please find inclosed the copies of the decisions and opinions referred to as follows, namely, in claim of Boatswain Joseph McDonald, December 29, 1882, marked "A;" Boatswain John D. Sinclair, January 3, 1883, marked "B;" two in the case of Gunner Samuel Cross, July 31 and August 16, 1883, marked "C" and "D," together with a copy of the opinion of the Attorney-General, marked "E."

The rates of "navy-pay" being dependent upon the kind of service performed, there must be for that reason more or less uncertainty in any mere estimate that can be made of its amount; and a statement of a single sum of money as the probable incurred expenditure referred to in the letter of the Senate committee would not fully answer the inquiry; because, as is indicated by the reference to an opinion of the Attorney-General, it appears not to be fully settled what periods of time are within the effects of the act of 1882 and the act of 1883 and the language of the House bill respectively.

For the purpose of the proposed estimates, I therefore assume that the benefits referred to in those acts and in the House bill do not include increase of pay in respect to services rendered prior to the officer's last entry into service in the regular Navy; and in order to arrive at the probable increased expenditure resulting from the legislation proposed by the House bill it has been necessary to estimate the probable increased expenditure made necessary by the acts of 1882 and 1883, and to deduct such increase, as well as the probable expenditure under prior laws, from the probable expenditure under the House bill.

Assuming as above that the language employed will not extend the higher rates of pay to services performed before an officer's last entry into service as an officer in the regular Navy, it is estimated that the acts of 1882 and 1883 had the effect to confer benefits in respect to services rendered subsequent to the passage of the act of 1883, which require an increased expenditure of about $29,000 per annum, and in respect to services rendered after the officer's last entry into the service and up to March 3, 1883, the date of the act of that year, an increased expenditure of about $105,000.

Under the language of the House bill those benefits in respect to services to be rendered in future are estimated at $45,000 per annum, more than would have been required if neither the act of 1882 nor that of 1883 had been passed, and for the year commencing at the date of the act of 1883 and ending March 3, 1884, a like increase of expenditure would be required, namely, $45,000.

Under the language of the House bill, those benefits in respect to services rendered from the time the officers respectively last entered service in the regular Navy to the date of the act of 1883 would probably require an increased expenditure of about $230,000, more than would have been required if neither the act of 1882 nor that of 1883 had been passed.

According to these estimates the direct reply to the inquiry made by the committee may be stated as follows:

The increased expenditure under the House bill in respect to services from such last entry into service to March 3, 1883, the date of the act of 1883, in excess of what is required by the acts of 1882 and 1883, is estimated at $125,000, and in respect to services rendered after that date, the annual increased expenditure under the House bill above what would be required under the act of 1882 and 1883, and prior laws, is estimated at $25,000 per year. It is estimated, also, that the language of the House bill would require an increased expenditure over and above what would accrue under the acts of 1882 and 1883, and prior laws, of probably $150,000, in order to give up to March 3, 1884, all the benefits of such actual service in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous, and in the regular Navy in the grade having graduated pay held by such officer at the time of the passage of the House bill, and that the annual amount of that increase hereafter would probably be about $25,000.

The above estimates are made upon a theory that the House bill will not increase the rate of pay of an officer for services rendered by him while serving in a lower grade than that held by him at the passage of the House bill.

Very respectfully,

W. W. UPTON, Comptroller.

Hon. CHARLES J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Bureau of Navigation," in line 130, after the word "war," to strike out "civil establishment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 134, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for the Bureau of Navigation from $80,000 to $100,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the Senator who has charge of the bill in reference to advancing this amount in the bill. I see in this clause there is an advance from $80,000 to $100,000. It may be all right but some of us want to know the reason for it. The amount as it came to the Senate, $80,000, included the "civil establishment," and I see the sum appropriated for that service last year was $5,000 and that is also proposed now, making a difference of $25,000 in the bill as reported. It may be all right, but I do not know anything about it, and I should like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. HALE. The Bureau of Navigation has charge of all that portion of the naval business relating to the fitting out of the vessels of the naval establishment with charts, compasses, chronometers, and kindred articles. The Department has been running for years upon an accumulation that had gathered during the years of the war and afterward. That is now exhausted. Last year the bureau had $100,000 and was able to get along by reducing the money that it paid for employing pilots in navigation. This year, to meet the new emergencies and demands upon it because it was crippled last year, it asks $130,000. The committee believes that it may be able to get along with the $100,000 that it had last year. It does not believe it can get along with $80,000, and so made that compromise between what was asked and what the House bill provides.

Now a word as to the item that the Senator from Delaware has called attention to, the striking out of the civil establishment. Let me say here what the committee has done, and it will explain the course in regard to all the bureaus. The House has reversed the plan which has been pursued by Congress for years of making a specific appropriation for the civil establishment. Congress has believed, and has acted upon the belief, that it is better for each Department and each bureau to have a specific appropriation for the civil establisment, so that a general appropriation shall not be used for clerks and employés, but that each bureau may be limited. The House changed that by putting in the civil establishment with the general appropriations, so that under the House bill with $100,000 appropriated the bureau might use $10,000 or $15,000 or $20,000 of it for clerks and civil employés. The Senate Committee on Appropriations have struck that out, and have put in the civil establishment by itself, so that no bureau shall be authorized to spend a single dollar for clerical force or employés beyond the limited sum that Congress gives for that purpose. I have no doubt this will appeal to the Senator from Delaware as being a very good provision, and all appropriation bills ought to run in that way. I am entirely confident they ought to be, and that is the reason the change has been made that he asks about.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator state why there is the difference between the amount of the appropriations here made by our committee and the appropriations originally made by the House for like service?

Mr. HALE. I did not quite catch the question.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If I understand aright, the appropriations for the civil establishment of the different bureaus of the Navy Department were heretofore included in the appropriation bills in bulk, and such portion as they saw fit to apply for the civil establishment could be used for that. How does the amount you here propose to appropriate compare with the amount actually used?

Mr. HALE. The Senator is wrong. It has been the habit heretofore to appropriate specifically, not in general. The House changed that and put it in general terms. We have simply taken it back to the way we have been appropriating, separately, by itself, but have given the same amount that the bureaus had heretofore. They have been limited heretofore.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I see you limit the Bureau of Navigation to $5,000 for the civil establishment, the Bureau of Ordnance to $5,000, the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting to $9,000, and you give the Bureau of Yards and Docks $24,000.

Mr. HALE. We take those sums from the expenditures of last year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 136, to increase the appropriation "for navigation outfit of the four new steel cruisers" from $30,000 to $60,000.

Mr. HALE. That is a mistake. That "sixty" should be "thirty." The "thirty thousand," as proposed by the House, is correct. It should not be made sixty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the proper course would be to disagree to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Certainly. I ask the Senate to do that.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 137 and 138, as follows:

For erection of compass-testing house, $7,000.

Mr. HALE. The committee decided that the Bureau of Navigation could get along, as it had for years past, without this compass-testing house. Since then facts have been laid before me more fully than before which convince me that in this new work now being undertaken of the building of the American Navy the Department needs just such a testing-house as is provided for here. The papers show that the estimates have been carefully made for an inexpensive building, and I am confident that the Department need it; that if we do not give it to them we shall be crippling them in some small way that will be very annoying and by which we should save very little money. I do not speak for the committee, because I have had no opportunity to consult the committee, but I think we had better non-concur in the amendment.

Mr. BECK. The idea I had in striking out the clause was that we had a naval observatory here and land was wanted for a new one, and in the present Naval Observatory, a pretty large building, there is plenty of room to make tests for years and years. It seems to me we ought not to make an additional appropriation for that now. I presume we are going to build a new naval observatory somewhere else, but I do not understand why we should want a testing-house such as is here proposed. Not having perhaps enough information to know all about it, I did not see why we should build a testing-house.

Mr. HALE. It is very much better that there should be an isolated building. Of course the argument can be made that as they have got along they can get on for a year or two longer, and I presume it is true that they can possibly and probably get along; but the time has come with the new demands upon the Navy when the Department believes seriously that it ought to have a building by itself, isolated, where this testing can be done. I think the Senate had better let this go and let them have the compass-testing house.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask if we not only do not incur the additional expense of a house, but whether there will not have to be additional employés to perform the service now performed at the observatory?

Mr. HALE. No, sir; no additional employés.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee to strike out lines 137 and 138.

The amendment was rejected.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 143, to increase the appropriation "for contingent expenses of the Bureau of Navigation" from $3,000 to $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 143, to insert at the close of the appropriations for the Bureau of Navigation:

For the civil establishment at navy-yards and stations, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "Bureau of Ordnance," in line 150, after the word "Department," to strike out "for the civil establishment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 152, to increase the appropriation from $105,000 to $140,000 "for procuring, producing, and preserving ordnance material; for the armament of ships; for fuel, tools, materials, and labor to be used in the general work of the Ordnance Department; for furniture at magazines, at the ordnance dock, New York, and at the naval experimental battery."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 153, to insert:

To continue the manufacture of modern guns, carriages, and ammunition for the rearmament of the Navy, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 156, to insert:

Toward the modern armament of the Navy: For machine cannon of small caliber and appliances, $39,480; and for Gatling guns and appliances, $16,500; in all, $75,980.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment was to insert after line 171, in the appropriations for the Bureau of Ordnance:

For the civil establishment at navy-yards and stations, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to ask the attention of the Senator in charge of this bill to that portion of the amendments of the committee from line 154 to line 156:

To continue the manufacture of modern guns, carriages, and ammunition for the rearmament of the Navy, $100,000.

I should like to know from the Senator in charge of the bill what is being done in the manufacture of modern guns, to which this appropriation is to be applied?

Mr. HALE. The Senator asks a question which calls attention to a very important subject.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the Senator that if it disturbs him in the course of his management of the bill to bring this subject up now, I will defer my remarks upon it or any consideration of it at present.

Mr. HALE. Not in the least. I am very glad the Senator has called attention to it, because I know he is in the habit of examining very carefully all documents and reports relating to subjects-matter in which he is interested, and I want to call his attention to the report of the gun-foundery board to be found in Executive Document No. 97, Forty-eighth Congress, first session. If the Senator has not read it I hope he will send for it and read it before the bill is finished by the Senate. It is a very exhaustive report. It is full of the most interesting facts and details, and it places before the country as has not been done before just the situation that we are in with relation to the manufacture of ordnance for our Army and our Navy.

It was a joint board made up of well-known skillful officers of the highest standing and with the best records. They visited the manufactories of arms in the Old World, and have made a very carefully prepared report showing just what the situation is as to this matter. Upon the basis of that report, which of course I can not go into now thoroughly, the Department asked Congress to appropriate this clause:

To continue the manufacture of modern guns, carriages, and ammunition for the rearmament of the Navy, $599,400.

The committee sent for the Secretary, feeling that this was a most important subject. The Secretary brought with him Commodore Sicard, who is the head of the Bureau of Ordnance. Commodore Sicard, in a most interesting interview or hearing before the Committee on Appropriations, told that committee of the condition of things as found in this report; and the long and short of it is that there are certain guns that at present can not be made in this country either by private or public establishments. We have a great plant in some of the navy-yards most of which can be utilized in the manufacture of modern ordnance, rifled cannon; but the experiments which have been made in this direction, all of them seeking to demonstrate that we can make rather than that we can not make, show thus far that without some material alteration and amplification and extension of our plant with our resources we can not make anything larger than the tubes or jackets of the 6-inch guns. The 8-inch guns the Department is not yet prepared to undertake to make. They can take the tubes as manufactured abroad, wherever it may be—at the Whitworth establishment or at Krupp's or at one of the French manufactories—and can complete them and make a good gun, as good as any power in the world has. It has not been demonstrated thus far that there can be made in the navy-yards of the Government establishments or by private corporations or individuals in this country anything larger than the 6-inch gun.

The committee was impressed in considering this matter with the importance of making a liberal appropriation toward this purpose of rearming the Navy, because everybody knows that the ships which we have now carry guns that in modern warfare would be of but little account. Warfare has progressed astonishingly in this direction. Twenty-five years ago we had the best guns in the world. The old Dahlgren gun and the Rodman gun were most admirable, most efficient, and dangerous war weapons. They have all gone into the limbo of the past, and we have got to have different sorts and kinds of ordnance now.

The committee, wanting to make liberal appropriations, were confronted with this statement of Commodore Sicard: that he could not use more than an additional $100,000 the next year over what the committee proposed to give him to furnish the armament of the new cruisers which are now building. He said that would exhaust the resources of the Government and the power and extent of our private establishments, and that $100,000 more, which the committee recommend, is all that he can use during the year to come.

I trust and believe that in the course of the next year the experiments which are being made con amore with the hope of good results will show that in the succeeding year we can put in the hands of the Bureau of Ordnance a much larger sum than this, a half million dollars perhaps, or it may be a million dollars, to be used to advantage in rearming our ships.

That is the reason, Mr. President, for the appropriation, and the reason that it has not been made larger.

Mr. BECK. I think it would be well if the Senator from Maine would place on record the reasons of Commodore Sicard, to be found in his letter of March 13, 1884, at page 5 of the document printed for the committee.

Mr. HALE. I think that had better be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BECK. That gives all the reasons why he wants the appropriation.

Mr. HALE. It is a very clear statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

BUREAU OF ORDNANCE, Washington, March 13, 1884.

SIR: In the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, the amounts appropriated are entirely inadequate to the needs of the Ordnance Department, and several items that were estimated for by this bureau and that are of the utmost importance to the Navy are wholly omitted.

I therefore beg leave to suggest that the Senate be urged to supply these omissions, and to increase the amounts appropriated by said bill.

With this view the following amendments and additions to the bill are proposed (the reasons therefor being briefly stated in each case):

In lines 148 and 149, page 7, strike out "one hundred and five thousand dollars" and insert "one hundred and eighty thousand dollars."

Reasons.—Should the navy-yards at League Island, Boston, and Pensacola be closed, as contemplated by the report of the navy-yard commission, it only seems possible to avoid a comparatively small part of the annual expenditure on "ordnance" proper; because we shall still have the same number of ships to fit and keep in serviceable condition as before concentration took place, and the same amount of ordnance work must be done upon them and in connection with them.

The annual expenditure of material will not be lessened, nor the deterioration due to age, nor the necessity for replacing equipments or supplies that are becoming obsolete.

As the work at the navy-yards is at present divided, the amount expended last year at the principal working yards (New York and Washington) amounted to $108,000, and when the fitting out of ships at Portsmouth, Norfolk, and Mare Island comes to be added, the expenditure will clearly aggregate $180,000 (the amount asked for).

The increasing elaboration of ordnance material of all kinds constantly tends to an increase of work.

For some years past the supply of ammunition for target practice with machine-guns and small-arms has been bought from the appropriation "sales of small-arms." This fund being now exhausted, the expenditure must come from the appropriation "ordnance."

The estimates submitted by the navy-yards for the fiscal year covered by the bill amounted to $258,000, which the bureau cut down to $180,000.

The amount appropriated for the current year was $150,000, and though all efforts have been made to expend it economically, $135,000 has already been spent, and a deficiency of $20,000 has been asked for.

After line 149, page 7, insert:

Toward the modern armament of the Navy: 40 machine-cannon of small caliber, $118,960; 20 Gatling guns, $33,000; 3,000 magazine-rifles, $101,250; in all, $253,210.

Reasons.—A large part of the armament of foreign ships of war of all classes now consists of machine-cannon and of musket-caliber machine-guns. The projectiles of the machine-cannon have sufficient energy to pierce the sides of all unarmored vessels, and the steel projectiles will pierce about one and one half inches of steel plate at moderate ranges. The shell from these guns is also very destructive, and they constitute a most valuable defense against torpedo-boats. Their power and importance have so impressed foreign naval authorities that we find the number of such arms supplied to foreign ships constantly on the increase.

Only three of our ships are equipped with machine-cannon (four in each), whereas all cruisers of moderate size should have at least two, and the larger vessels from four to eight each.

The forty machine-cannon asked for would arm about fifteen ships of moderate size.

Most of our ships on the different stations have one Gatling gun each. Foreign ships have sometimes as many as six, eight, and ten each. It is safe to say that each vessel of any size should carry at least two; and twenty of such guns would only serve for ten small ships. The Gatling gun has recently been altered so as to greatly increase its efficiency, and the bureau desires to avail itself of this improvement.

Magazine-rifles are now being introduced into all services, as their use enables a much greater weight of fire to be thrown at critical moments than would otherwise be possible. All machine-arms have this great advantage, and foreign services thoroughly appreciate the fact.

The number of magazine-rifles asked for would arm about twenty small vessels.

Insert after the foregoing:

"For machine-tools, $20,000."

Reasons.—More machinery is required in the Ordnance Department of the Washington navy-yard, to be used in the manufacture of the new steel guns.

Lines 158 and 159, page 7, strike out "$3,000" and insert "$5,000."

Reasons.—The heavy freight now being handled by the bureau requires this increase of the estimate for contingent expenses. Of the $3,000 appropriated for the current fiscal year we have less that $250 left.

In line 146, page 7, strike out "for the civil establishment" and insert after line 159, same page, "for the civil establishment at navy-yards and stations, $12,234.50."

Reasons.—The amount at present allowed for the civil establishment only admits of the employment of one clerk or writer at four of the navy-yards, the clerical work at the other navy-yards and stations being done by the storekeepers and others whose pay is drawn from appropriation "ordnance."

The object is to release the appropriation ordnance from this tax and give adequate pay to the clerical force. But if it is judged best by Congress to pay the clerical force altogether from the appropriation ordnance, then it is requested that the $12,234.50 be added to that appropriation, making $192,234.50.

After line 164, page 7, insert:

"For the purchase of a torpedo-boat and the working drawings of the same, $55,000."

Reasons.—Such boats are absolutely necessary to the national defense. None have as yet been built in this country, and it is proposed to purchase the one asked for from one of the most celebrated makers abroad. It will serve as a model from which others may be constructed here.

After the foregoing insert:

"To continue the manufacture of modern guns, carriages, and ammunition for the rearmament of the Navy, $599,400."

Reasons.—There are no such guns, carriages, &c., now in the Navy, and it is imperatively necessary that they be provided for the national defense. The money heretofore appropriated has only served to partially commence the manufacture of type guns, carriages, and ammunition, the ships afloat in commission being still armed with obsolete and inferior cannon. The money asked for would purchase about twenty-five 6-inch guns and eight 8-inch guns, with their carriages and ammunition.

In case the above amount is not allowed, the balance that may remain on hand from the appropriation "steel rifled breech-loading guns" should at least be reappropriated.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

MONTGOMERY SICARD, Chief of Bureau.

Hon. WILLIAM E. CHANDLER, Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. MORGAN. I called attention to this subject because I wanted information about it. Since I have been in the Senate we have been considering year by year certain experimental efforts of the Ordnance Department to get some guns suitable for seacoast defense, and also for the Navy, and we have made absolutely no progress except to ascertain that we have no guns which are of any real value; and our system must be changed in that respect, I think, before we ever make any progress.

The commission that has been spoken of by the Senator from Maine went abroad last summer, I believe, and also made some explorations through the United States for the purpose of examining into the different ordnance establishments or the different iron and steel establishments capable of manufacturing guns. It submitted a report, which I have not had the opportunity to examine with any care. I have merely glanced through it. But I understand that they recommend now that we shall go on in the old grooves and look abroad for our steel; that we shall not begin now to build establishments for the purpose of making steel or for the purpose of working steel.

I do not know whether the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate felt themselves warranted in going any farther than they have gone in providing for some changes in our system, but I believe that unless they do it we shall never have any changes. At the last Congress a joint committee was organized consisting of the chairman and some members of the two Committees on Naval Affairs and Military Affairs. They called before them a number of witnesses and made a very interesting and very able report on this subject, and then the report of the board spoken of has followed that, and the whole matter has gone to rest except the little relief that the Committee on Appropriations find that it can give to this important subject for the Navy and Army of the United States on this important matter. I should be very glad if the Senate would take into consideration whether they are not willing now to take some method of manufacturing steel and manufacturing steel guns, to lay a foundation for it that the Government can control.

Why, sir, I do not think that anything should bring a deeper blush to the cheek of an American citizen than to feel that fifty or sixty millions of people in a country like this are absolutely indefensible against any foreign foe except when they might make a landing here and undertake to attack us around our own homes. The Government of the United States, every one must admit—everybody has been saying it for many years past—is in the most defenseless condition in reference to its seacoast defense and its naval armament against almost any civilized government in the world of maritime power. The small petty powers of the earth are in advance of us, and the Senate can scarcely ever consider a subject of foreign relations that has in it any matter of delicacy at all without feeling that we are unprepared to deal with the question with that sort of energy which belongs to a great and powerful people like this.

I am not in favor of conducting the relations and affairs of nations upon a war basis; but whoever undertakes to strike out from the policy of nations that feature of the question will find that he is not abreast of the age, and he will find that he can not apply the Quaker doctrine to a government like this. We are a peace-loving people, we are not aggressive in our policies in any respect whatever; but in order to preserve the peace we must have the means at command to satisfy the other powers of the world that if they break the peace we shall be prepared to meet their assaults instantly and with force and effect.

We have a Navy that has no guns which are capable of fighting the guns of other nations. We have a seacoast that is defenseless almost, except by a few torpedo lines and a few old guns that we do not know the value of, and I think the Senate ought now to take into consideration seriously two propositions: First, of establishing in this country works for the production of steel and the making of steel guns; secondly, to supply all the proper machinery to make those guns.

We have no steam-hammer in this country that is capable of hammering the steel necessary for the largest-sized gun. Why should we be without an implement of that kind? Perhaps $100,000 or $200,000 at the outside would establish it and put it in operation. We should not then be compelled to import the steel which we put in our own guns from England and from Germany. Why should we not have that? We have got our navy-yards——

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to state to him that for an ordinary hammer the estimate is $500,000 or $600,000, and Krupp was paid $2,500,000 in Germany for one gun. The Committee on Naval Affairs are considering all these things now, and we can not reach them. Commodore Sicard made a very interesting statement about them, but they are beyond our reach now. We can not even make an eight-inch gun in our country; we have not a hammer large enough for that. Something will have to be done.

Mr. MORGAN. If $100,000 is within the reach of the Committee on Appropriations by way of amendment to this House bill to continue the manufacture of modern guns, two millions or two millions and a half or three millions is not beyond the reach of the committee; and if Mr. Krupp with his individual enterprise can build a steam-hammer that cost him two millions and a half of money, why is it that the Government of the United States can not have one that will cost three millions of money, a better one than he has got or than anybody has got?

Mr. BECK. One word more. It was ascertained that in England and elsewhere the large steam-hammers that are used in the world are owned by private establishments, and they can be utilized for a great many other things. The Navy Department has to consider whether or not we had better treat with somebody who uses these hammers for many other purposes rather than build one of our own.

Mr. MORGAN. That brings up the very point I was about to arrive at. I am satisfied after some examination into this question that the proper course for the Government to take is to interest private enterprise in connection with governmental inspection and supervision in the manufacture of guns; provide in some way an advance of money to some enterprising private citizens or private corporations engaged on our own soil in the manufacture of steel, so that they can erect these steel hammers and use them for the Government, for governmental purposes, and when not in use for governmental purposes they can be put in use for commercial purposes. I would interest them as has been done in some other cases in this country, for I know of one instance where the Government of the United States must have at least $200,000 in value of most excellent machinery of modern type in the hands of private parties to make guns for the Government. Under an arrangement of this kind these parties take the machinery at cost; they pay for it in work, pay 5 per cent. per annum or 10 per cent. per annum in work in their yards. The work is subjected to governmental supervision from the time the metal is put into the furnace until it is drawn out, manufactured, and ready for delivery at the navy-yards or wherever it may be that we want to use the gun.

If we will combine private enterprise with Government supervision in the manufacture of guns in this country there is no reason why we can not make just as good guns as they make in England or anywhere else. We have the material to make them of. If we need non-phosphoritic ores in order to get gun material, we can send to Egypt to get them, or to Spain. We of course bring in our material free that is used for the benefit of the Government. The instance to which I referred was in Boston.

Mr. HALE. The South Boston Works.

Mr. MORGAN. The South Boston Iron Works, where they have been manufacturing guns for thirty years for the United States Government and for other governments, for Italy and for Brazil and various governments, and according to their facilities and the machinery they possess they make guns equal to any in the world. It turned out that there was some surplus money at some time or other in the Ordnance Department, which I believe resulted from the sale of old scrap or old material of some kind, and the Chief of Ordnance found himself at liberty, very properly, too, to invest that money in machinery and put it in the South Boston Iron Works upon a contract of the character I have just referred to, by which that establishment was to make guns and was to refit guns, and to receive in part payment of the costs of those guns a part of the cost of the machinery which was turned over, so that after awhile the establishment will buy the machinery, will become the entire owner of it, and the Government in the mean time will have received its pay in the production of this work, these guns.

That has worked remarkably well in that one case. I have no doubt there are other cases of the kind in the United States, and I believe that if that system were observed, if we should go into it as one of our experiments, and unite private enterprise with Government assistance and Government supervision in the making of these guns, we could in a short time have guns equal to any in this world.

The Senate will pardon me for reference to a matter that I happen to have personal knowledge of in respect to the ability of our private citizens to improvise heavy ordnance and all manner of armament. When the Confederate States went to war they had no guns except those mounted on the different forts in the South; but at the town in which I live a gentleman was detailed, Catesby Jones, who had been an officer of the United States Navy, to establish a naval foundery, a gun foundery. They had no facilities. The ores were in the bank; the furnaces to melt them were not built; the trees that made the charcoal were standing in the forest. They had to build railways to get to within miles of the location. They made the iron, carried it down to the city of Selma; they brought it to the naval foundery, and out in your foundery here at the navy-yard now there are some ten or more of those guns that were captured by Admiral Farragut at the time of the capture of Mobile. Those guns were made in furnaces of a capacity of one hundred tons, and made with pine wood. No other fuel was used but pine wood. There they are in this navy-yard now. The bands that are around them are wrought-iron bands, constructed with admirable skill, such as can not be produced to-day in any navy-yard in the United States, for the mere reason that we have not got the machinery to do it with; and yet the machinery to do that kind of work is inexpensive; if it had not been we could not have gotten it in the South. We did not import it; it was improvised and made in the South.

Sir, you may take those guns and put them side by side with any of the cast-iron rifled guns in the United States Army or Navy to-day and they will bear as severe a test as any guns that have been made. There was necessity forcing those people to the production of those guns, and we would produce them if we were in a state of war to-day with any great foreign power; we would produce our ordnance, all that was necessary, within a very short space of time. We would have our ships armed in a short period of time with guns of sufficient caliber and capacity to fight the guns of almost any other nation of the world. But merely because the stress of necessity is not upon us we ignore this very important matter.

I am in favor of the old saw, "In time of peace prepare for war." That is wise, sound, good policy, and it is policy that this great nation can not afford to ignore, and the greater it gets the less it can afford to ignore it.

I do not know that I shall move any amendment in this particular unless the committee think that it ought to be done at this time. I shall take it into consideration and before we get through this bill I wish to examine this report, and I hope the committee will think the subject over, and if we can arrive at some conclusion of this sort I for one will give my support to it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator, I know, has given a great deal of time and has an intelligent interest in this subject. I wish he would take this report, if he can, to-night, look it over carefully, and see what he for one, as a member of this body, is ready to do in the way of embarking in this enterprise of governmental establishments that can manufacture an entire gun. That is a serious question. It is a serious question whether the Government shall grapple with that problem. It can not be done without involving in the future an expenditure of a large sum of money. I am entirely ready to go with the Senator to any extent in so expending money, for I believe with him that there is something culpable, something criminal in the hap-hazard, easy-go-lucky way that we are going on at present with reference to our national defense. But whoever sets out on this road, whoever weds himself to this enterprise, has got to consider that from time to time large sums of money will be required. If the American Congress is ready to appropriate those sums of money and will follow its hand and will not falter, but from year to year will, almost in the nature of a permanent appropriation, give those sums of money, we shall reach that point so much desired by the Senator from Alabama—of the United States manufacturing all its guns, great and small.

As I have said, I will go with him very far in that direction. The board that considered this subject, as the Senator will find when he comes to examine the report, go into it very thoroughly. They do not arrive at the conclusion that the United States, either by governmental factories or by private means, should not manufacture these guns. Quite the reverse. They say clearly:

The board recommends the establishment of two gun factories under the control of the Government.

And it makes a selection. Then it goes on touching the question whether the Army and the Navy each should have an establishment, and arrives at the conclusion that an establishment for each branch of the military force of the Government should be set up and maintained, one for the Army and one for the Navy. They go on further and say:

With Government gun factories established for both the Army and the Navy, there will be still needed the hearty co-operation of the private industries of the country. This can not be aroused unless there is held out to them a fair prospect of remuneration. The board does not approve of a partnership in business between the Government and private firms. All history warns against such a course. But it does believe that joint, and at the same time independent, action between them can be made to work harmoniously toward the common national purpose.

The board found this difficulty when it began to deal with the question of encouraging private establishments, such establishments as are found in great force and strength in the old world under the enterprising lead of men of genius who have built them up. The board found themselves confronted with this trouble, that the private manufacturer in this country can not afford to go on, extend his plant, build up his establishment, because of the uncertainty whether the Government will come to his rescue and employ him to make guns, or encourage him to make guns, or a portion of the guns, for any length of time. They say:

At present the steel manufacturers of our country are not prepared to produce the material required for the larger calibers, and the important question arises, what means shall be adopted to induce them to study the subject and embark in the manufacture on a large scale. They can not be expected to do this at a sacrifice of their own interests. This object can only be achieved by holding out a fair prospect of ultimate remuneration for the expenditures necessary to undertake the work, and this can only be done by the action of Congress.

Everybody sees that however enterprising, however patriotic may be the owner of one of these private establishments, however much he may be willing to extend his plant and increase his establishment, he ought to feel that he can depend upon something like a permanent policy on the part of the Government in encouraging him. The English Government, the French Government, the German Government, the government, indeed, of every power in Europe that makes any essay toward establishing and maintaining a naval force, appropriates money by millions year after year, and it is because of this that the great establishments there that are the wonder of the world are kept up from year to year, knowing as they do that the governments will patronize them in that part of the world in the manner that they do. But it costs money, and a great deal of money, as I have said. If the Government has establishments of its own, which in connection with private establishments can make these great guns, as I believe it ought to have, and I am ready to vote large sums of money to that end, it ought to contemplate what it is going into; it ought not to set its hand to the plow and then go back; it ought to go steadily on appropriating money out of our surplus revenue. The board have made an estimate here.

Approximate cost of plant for producing the tempered parts of guns up to one hundred tons, ready for delivery at gun factory.

Because there are two processes, there are two stages. There is the stage of preparing the gun for the gun factory, and here is the estimate of that:

|---|---|
| Casting | $250,000 |
| Forging (hydraulic press) | 150,000 |
| Rough boring and turning | 210,000 |
| Tempering | 50,000 |
| Total | 660,000 |
| Additional cost if liquid compression be adopted | 175,000 |

That is a favorite theory and belief with these great manufacturers. Now, a hammer, as tremendous as is its power, its compacting force, is not so efficient as the hydraulic pressure in compacting a gun. If that is added it brings the expenditure up to nearly $900,000. Then the board take the other stage, the plant for gun factories; take the tools; take them in the rough and complete them so that they become perfect ordnance for our ships or for our fortifications, and that estimate is $900,000. There of itself in one establishment covering those two stages is needed $1,800,000.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. May I ask the Senator how many establishments there are engaged in the business of gun manufacture on a large scale now?

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator mean how many in the world?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No; I mean in the United States.

Mr. HALE. There is the South Boston foundery; there is the Midvale Steel Company, at Philadelphia; there is the West Point establishment. There are four or five different establishments that can do something toward this end in the manufacture of small guns.

Mr. BECK rose.

Mr. HALE. Will not the Senator let me complete what I am saying?

Mr. BECK. Before the Senator goes further I wish to state one fact. Commodore Sicard and others advise us that our manufacturers say that the Government of the United States at the present price of our guns would be the only customer for them, whereas Krupp and those other men are making large numbers of guns in Prussia and in England and selling them to China, Japan, Italy, and Brazil, and all the countries of the world. Therefore in building up our establishments we have to build on the basis that we ourselves are to be the only customer, and that requires a good deal of consideration as to how it ought to be done. Therefore our committee could not grapple with that subject.

Mr. HALE. All that bears very materially on this question. The board wind up by these wise and pertinent words and conclusions:

Three years—

After estimating the cost of these factories and plants—

Three years will be required to complete the tools, construct the shops, and establish the plant. Such a factory—

Costing $900,000—

Such a factory will be able to turn out per year fifty 6-inch, seventeen 12-inch, and twelve 16-inch guns, or a proportionally larger number of smaller calibers, at a yearly expense of about $2,000,000. The figures can not be pronounced exact, but the board is confident that they closely approximate accuracy. The calculations are based upon estimates obtained abroad, and do not include ocean freight and customs dues.

If Congress is ready to embark in this enterprise of building up for the Government a great gun factory and a great plant for preparing guns for the gun factory, so that our steel shall be taken and made into the tube and the tube shall be taken and wrought into the gun, and so that we shall not stop at an 8-inch gun or a 12-inch gun, at nothing short of a hundred-ton gun, I am ready to go along in that direction. But the committee did not deem it wise to embody this in their recommendations in the bill. It must be left for amendment to be offered on the floor by any Senator, and I am glad that the Senator from Alabama is considering this matter, and I hope before we reach the end of the consideration of this bill that he may have matured some plan by which we may start in upon this which I think is a worthy and a meritorious enterprise.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, about six weeks ago the Senate passed a bill to build, I think, seven steel cruisers or seven vessels of war, as the commencement of a respectable naval force, it being admitted on all hands that there was no such thing to-day in practical existence as an American navy, and very wisely they proposed to commence one. There were four monitors that were on the stocks from 1872 to 1882. I believe there was an appropriation to make them efficient. Then there was a proposition to build and finish four other sloops of war, and then in addition came the bill to which I have referred, to build seven ships of varying dimensions, but all of a modern model and fitted for the purposes required by the modern progress of invention. I voted for that bill, and after the bill had passed I offered a resolution that was adopted by the Senate and sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs, directing them to report upon the expediency of building a steam-hammer with a foundery properly equipped for the construction of artillery of the largest caliber and of modern fashion.

My desire for such information had been quickened by a letter read here upon the floor from Admiral Rodgers. I can not lay my hand upon it, but my recollection of that letter was that the United States Government did not own a single breech-loading cannon, if not of any caliber, of anything like effective caliber. I think I may refer to the Senator from Maine, whose knowledge is greater of naval affairs than my own, and to my friend from Kentucky, and ask whether the Government owns to-day a single breach-loading cannon; and yet I apprehend that other cannon will be considered obsolete for the purposes of modern warfare.

Mr. HALE. I will not interrupt the Senator unless it is entirely agreeable to him.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to be correct in my statement, and I submit it rather to the criticism of the Senator from Maine. Am I not right in this fact? I am speaking now of the state of affairs under which we live.

Mr. HALE. I do not know; I can not give the Senator information of the number of guns of different kinds, but the United States Government in the past two years has taken a number—I do not know how great—of the old cast-iron guns and has adapted them so far as it might to the modern system of breech-loading rifled guns. They are not as strong, they will not stand the pressure and the test that the modern-constructed gun will, but I can not tell the Senator how many there are of them.

I want to say one thing further in answer to what the Senator urges as to the resolution that he sent to the Naval Committee. It did, as the Senator intended, raise this whole question of the advisability, the feasibility of the Government building a gun factory and building a hammer of its own to make guns. Since the Senator introduced that resolution the report of this board from which I have been reading has been sent in to the Senate by the President, his message accompanying the report, and the Naval Committe has felt that no investigation by it could add anything to the valuable mass of information contained in that document. I do not believe that we could have produced information that would have thrown any light on this subject in answer to the Senator's resolution equal to that. That is the reason why we have done nothing more.

Mr. BAYARD. Perhaps, Mr. President, it would have been well for me to have read this report, but one may be pardoned for not reading every report that may be presented to Congress. I shall read it with a great deal of interest at the earliest possible opportunity, but I do not understand from the Senator in charge of this bill, and who is also the virtual chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that there is any inaccuracy in what I have said, and I cite it not all for the purpose of finding fault with anybody; I cite it for the purpose of stating facts as they stand in order that we may apply the remedy.

I read in the bill an appropriation—

> Toward the modern armament of the Navy: For machine-cannon of small caliber, and appliances, $59,480; and for Gatling guns and appliances, $16,500; in all, $75,980.

And that is to be for the "modern armament of the Navy!" One would think that we were legislating for the kingdom of Lilliput and not for the United States of America in the condition in which we now stand.

Mr. HALE. I agree fully with the Senator there. I am in entire accord with him in that.

Mr. BAYARD. Very well. Then with due respect, I do not see here really one advance of a positive step toward a reformation of this unsatisfactory condition of things. I know that a certain amount of demand must precede the supply. Lately in reading the biography of a very distinguished English engineer and metallurgist I found that when a contract had been taken for the steamer known as the Great Eastern and the contractor looked around for a hammer in Great Britain for the purpose of forging her shafts he found the work could not be executed in that kingdom at that time, and it was that which brought the steam-hammer of James Nasmyth into use by which that shaft was forged, beaten, and the work enabled to be accomplished. But we are not without experience. We know too well what is needed; the demand for this steam-hammer is not a new one.

The Government of the United States ought to furnish itself with it unless there shall be—which I believe there is in the private establishments of this country—machinery of a sufficient force and proper construction to make cannon of modern models and caliber. When I see the United States appropriating $75,000 gravely toward modern armament and China buys from Krupp nine hundred guns each one of which will cost the whole of and more than this entire appropriation, it seems to me that our people are losing sight of all proportion of means to the end.

That there has been money enough wasted to buy all these things is true; but that does not cure the case. The point is whether now if you shall begin at the beginning and place this navy, or this proposed navy, upon the basis of progress toward completion, it is not proper to have at least the steam-machinery, the steam-hammer, the appurtenant foundery, the plant and appliances which shall enable us to commence at least the reparation of this great deficiency in our naval establishment. I am in favor—painful though it may be to be obliged to do so—of going out of this country and buying guns of the modern type. We are importing now steel plates for the turrets of the four monitors because they can not be forged in this country nor supplied here. Some information was sought by the Senator from New Jersey of the terms upon which the contracts with the English founderymen were made.

I have voted for these appropriations and I am perfectly willing to sustain by my vote the suggestion that I have made of a proportionate appropriation to start this steam-hammer and the foundery that I suppose must be one of its adjuncts. I saw the other day that the great Prussian gun manufacture and plant for a large gun would cost some two and a half millions of money in round numbers, and I do not suppose it will cost less in this country, especially when the Government builds it, for we always have to pay more than private individuals, but that had much better be bought. That the private workshops of Great Britain are able to do the work of the government to almost any extent, is a source of great safety and great pride to that country. It will be equally so to this and the safeguard to the public Treasury will consist that when the Government shall have one such establishment as will enable us to construct artillery of modern character and caliber it will not be liable to be imposed upon by a combination of private contractors. In other words there will be a fair field of competition. If the private contractor is able to do this work well and will do it reasonably, the Government will act most wisely to have its work performed by private contract. The double duty will be effected; the Government will be provided with what it wants on favorable terms and the people of the country will be educated in that skill which can only come from practice.

The English system is one from which we can fairly draw wisdom and learn by experience. The double system there obtains. The government is not subjected to any possible extortion from the private contractor, but has the advantage should he exceed what is reasonable in his demands for his work of being able to do the work themselves in their own yards. The result has been very naturally, and according I think to the public experience, that four-fifths, nay nine-tenths of the English vessels of war have been constructed in private yards, and I believe that every English gun—and they are very superior—the guns of Whitworth, the guns of Armstrong, the guns of Blakely—every one of them is furnished to the government by private contract. I know not what Great Britain may have bought from Germany. I know not what Krupp may have sold of his wonderful steel cannon to that government; but I do not think the British Government for a long time has absolutely constructed its modern artillery, although there are government shops in England where the work can be done in case of necessity on account of the greed of private competitors.

I believe the two things will run pari passu, the equipment and purchase of the steam-hammer by the Government, the foundery and appurtenances to it to enable the construction, if necessary, of modern artillery by the Government, and the progress by American citizens toward the construction of these guns whenever they find that their Government is disposed to buy them and will seek to purchase them. But the demand must precede the supply; there must be something to create, to furnish the supply; the incentive must exist, and up to this time there has not been much incentive for an American to embark his capital in such large sums for the purpose of building these guns. At least I say this when you look at what has been the experience of the administration of the Naval Department of this country for the last twenty years.

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] shows me in this bill that more money than the $75,980 is to be expended; that in addition to this a previous item provides $100,000 "to continue the manufacture of modern guns, carriages, and ammunition," and that is all, $175,000—about the cost of a single gun of the formidable type of the present day. In another page of the bill I find:

> To complete the ordnance outfit of the three new steel cruisers and one dispatch boat, $400,000.

Mr. BECK. With those guns complete, $100,000 will be about all the bureau can use at this time. So the head of the bureau informed us.

Mr. BAYARD. I would add further, without professing to be accurate as to precise sums, that I suppose this $400,000 will give these boats about one gun apiece; it will give the four new vessels about one gun each.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no.

Mr. BECK. My recollection is twenty 6-inch guns and eight 8-inch guns.

Mr. HALE. Four 8-inch guns.

Mr. BAYARD. I mean by guns real guns with which we can compete with the guns of other nations. I have seen myself one or two experiments in naval artillery. Suppose, then, that this $400,000 shall sufficiently arm, according to modern demands, the four ships mentioned; there we end, and for all else and for all the other ships and coast defense in this country there is the splendid sum proposed of $175,000!

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I appreciate all that the Senator from Delaware has said with respect to the inadequacy of this appropriation for the purpose of establishing an artillery system for the Navy, but I can not see the wisdom of going much further than this bill provides, inasmuch as we have not yet determined fully upon the policy of building a navy. We do not want any guns unless we have some ships to carry them. The ships are the first thing to be provided. Usually the armament comes afterward and the rigging. We are speaking of naval armament.

Mr. BAYARD. What of shore defenses?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think the great necessity of the country at the present day is a respectable naval force. As I said in my place in the Senate when the bill was here providing for the construction of the seven new cruisers, as a member of the Senate and of the Naval Committee I understood that two years ago this Government had entered upon the policy of building a new navy, and I said that every Senator who voted in favor of the proposition that was then carried to give the Secretary of the Navy authority to do away with our wooden ships committed himself to the policy of building a new navy. When that bill was before the Senate, as the Senator from New Jersey well knows, I questioned the policy of giving that power to the Secretary of the Navy, because I felt that this political body or the other might not come up to the manifesto and be willing to make the necessary appropriations to fill the vacuum created by the retirement of our wooden ships. My fears have been realized. We have gone on; we have authorized him to retire nearly every available ship in the Navy by what is known as the 30 per cent. clause. They are going out every day, and in the course of a few years, as I said in the former debate, there will not be a ship on the ocean bearing the American flag; they will all have been retired under the authority of Congress.

The Senator from New Jersey in the discussion of the steel-cruiser bill asked me the question, I remember, if I were the Secretary of the Navy would I not dispense with the execution of that law? He read a list of the ships that had already been retired, nearly seventy in number, under the authority of Congress given to the Secretary of the Navy a year or so ago. I said to him what I say now, that no executive officer of the Government can dispense with the execution of a law. He has no dispensing power. That power once belonged to the Stuart family in England; happily for our country it never has been exercised here. The executive officer must execute the law, and he would not be a faithful officer if he did not; and under it in a year or so you will not have a ship. This was the great reason why I, as a member of the Naval Committee, came to the front a little in that discussion in conjunction with my friend from Maine and the Senator from South Carolina, and advocated the policy of replacing those ships with new vessels conforming to the changes in modern warfare and the requisitions of the times.

Now, where are we? It is well enough to talk about the creation of a factory for guns, rigging, and all that, but we have not yet any provision of law looking to the creation of a navy, I mean the hulls of ships, the most important part. This provision, I think, goes far enough as things now stand, for I am willing to go as far as any Senator in providing for the erection of a steam-hammer such as was recommended by my friend from Delaware; but we want a navy. We could better afford to do away with the Army than the Navy, for a great country, with prospective commercial relations with the whole world, and especially if the view of my friend from Kentucky, with respect to an untrammeled commercial intercourse prevails, in which I concur with him, we shall want it more still.

No nation occupying the position that this does among the powers of the earth can afford to occupy its present attitude and be at a disadvantage, as I said before, with Brazil, with all the little, weak, insignificant powers to the south of us on this continent. We have not a ship in commission to-day bearing the American flag that can compare with those of the little republics to the south, or of Spain, whose possessions lie within the sight of our own shores.

I said before that there were abuses in the Navy, but I am not here to anticipate any more. This is no party question. Any party that is in control of a government like this owes it to the country, to its citizens and its great interests to see that this important arm of the public service is not neglected. The President has sent in a special message regarding the building up of the Navy. I do not suppose he did that because he was a Republican, and when I vote for any proposition of that kind I do not do it as a Democrat. I do it because I feel in my blood and bone that all the interests of the United States require it, and that this country to-day is at a disadvantage with every other on the face of the earth with respect to her naval force.

Mr. VEST obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator, before he proceeds, allow me to introduce certain amendments to be read and printed that I should like to give notice of now?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I give notice of two amendments to be offered at a subsequent stage of the bill when we come to the provision for fitting up the navy-yards for the purpose of constructing ships.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be reported for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase and erection of plant for casting, forging, rough-boring, and tempering guns up to one hundred tons, ready for delivery at gun factories, including cost of the process of liquid compression, if adopted, $835,000.

For plant for gun factory for completing guns from 6-inch caliber to 16-inch caliber, including buildings and shrinking-pot, $900,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be printed for the information of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, commercial supremacy and naval power are inseparable. The first duty and principal object of a navy is to defend the seaboard, and next to police the ocean and protect our foreign commerce. We are the great middle country, with 10,000 miles of seacoast, $1,547,020,316 of yearly commerce, and an enormous annual increase of exports; and yet we have virtually no navy, no merchant marine, and a defenseless seaboard.

Who is responsible for this national dishonor? Who is responsible for this statement that brings the blush of shame to the cheek of every honest American citizen? Twenty of our large cities could, in the event of war with one of the foreign powers, be powdered into dust by the ironclad navies of Europe.

This condition is the result of maladministration and reckless waste of $385,000,000 appropriated by Congress since 1866 for the support of the Navy. Is it cause of surprise that some hesitation is expressed in regard to the propriety of placing millions more where all these millions have been lost? "Confidence is a plant of slow growth," and I must be pardoned for saying frankly that the American people can see nothing in either the present or past which leads them to expect from the party now in power a revival of our naval or commercial supremacy. I say this with no partisan feeling, but from the deliberate conviction that the influences which surround the Navy Department and the system of governmental policy to which the Republican party is devoted are hostile alike to the welfare of the Navy and merchant marine. What these influences may be or what this system (of which I shall say more hereafter), the paramount and immediate duty resting upon us is to furnish adequate seacoast defenses.

Mr. President, what to-day is the condition of our seaboard, stripped of all rhetoric and surplusage of words? From a most interesting article lately placed before the American public I will read one or two official extracts, and the mere statement, coming from the sources from which it is taken, beggars all rhetoric or attempt at eloquence. Says General Wright, the Chief of Engineers, in his report of 1881:

With old casemated works (than which there were none better in the world in their day), designed long before the introduction of the 800 to 2,000 pounder rifled guns into modern warfare; their walls pierced for guns long since out of date; without iron armor or shields, and but partially armed even with the old ordnance; with old earthworks, some of them built in the last century; with new ones for modern guns and mortars but partially built and rapidly being destroyed by the elements by reason of their incompletion; with gun batteries without guns, and mortar batteries without mortars; with no carriages whatever for barbette guns of large size, except such as require the cannoneers to load from the tops of parapets, from which they can be picked off in detail by the enemy's sharpshooters; with an excellent defensive torpedo system developed at our torpedo school at Willets Point, but only partially carried into effect; with but a very small number of our works prepared with the torpedo casemates and galleries necessary for securing the electrical apparatus from the enemy's fire and for conducting the electric wires to the torpedo lines, which must be laid when the day of trial comes, and with less than two hundred engineer soldiers educated for torpedo and other engineer service instead of the seven hundred and fifty-two men now authorized by law, and of whom not less than five hundred and twenty ought to be ready to supply the detachments required for torpedo duty in our fortified harbors, we can make but a feeble defense against the powerful fleets now prepared and rapidly increasing, which will sooner or later be brought against us by some of the most powerful maritime nations on the earth, or by others nearer at hand whose offensive naval means exceed our own, and whose powers are not to be despised.

If this, coming from the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, needs supplement, let us turn to the highest naval authority, a statement of Admiral Porter, of the Navy:

What a pitiable exhibit—

Says he—

for a country like this is the report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, who states that there is not one of our ports that has any defense against even an enemy of very inferior character. I know this to be the case from my own observation, for there is not a harbor in the country where an ordinary ironclad can not pass the batteries, choosing their own time for so doing. So it appears that our Army defenses are in the same category as those of our Navy. It is therefore indispensable that both should forthwith take a new departure to insure that effectual protection to our countrymen which they have a right to demand. * * * When I speak of our unprotected coast I refer to our lake coast as well.

Our brothers of the Northwest can listen to this: "I refer to our lake coast as well." He proceeds:

In case of war between Great Britain and the United States, it would be comparatively easy for the former to get possession of all the lakes, and with her powerful navy lay our cities under contribution or destroy them. For this reason we should pay proper attention to our defenses on the shores of the great lakes. The dangers threatened here appeal directly to our representatives from the West.

Whatever may have been the influences that have brought about or contributed to this terrible condition of affairs, there is one platform upon which we can all stand without regard to party and as citizens of the United States, and it is the overwhelming, the absolute, the indescribable necessity now and here of coast defenses for the Government and people of the United States. In the bill before the Senate I find no such provision. The Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] tells us that with seven new cruisers we can defend our coast, and that is the commencement of a navy.

In the bill before the Senate $400,000 is appropriated to complete the ordnance outfit of the three new steel cruisers and dispatch-boat now under contract with Mr. Roach, and $2,500,000 for two additional cruisers of 4,500 and 3,000 tons, one dispatch-vessel, and four gunboats. It can not be pretended that these vessels would last an hour before the ironclads of Europe; against such vessels as the Inflexible and Alexandra, of the British navy, the former of 11,880 tons and 8,010 horse-power, and the latter of 9,490 tons and 8,610 horse-power, armed with 81-ton rifled guns. These cruisers and gunboats would not avail more than the steamers on our Western rivers.

Mr. President, we have heard here to-day about the vast expense to be incurred in buying guns for our seaboard defenses and for our Navy when it is built. Last spring effete, worn-out, bankrupt Italy, the land of macaroni and lazzaroni, launched from her own navy-yards the ironclad Lepanto, the largest and most formidable vessel now afloat, 14,000 tons, with 18,000 horse-power, running nineteen English miles an hour, impervious above the water-line to shot or shell, armed with four 100-ton turret guns and a number of smaller broadside guns, all rifled and breech-loading.

At Spezzia in 1882, the Italians, this effete and worn-out people, put the extreme test to heavy ordnance in the shape of an Armstrong breech-loading rifled 100-ton gun, caliber 17¾ inches and 33 feet length of bore.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are building some with fifty-five feet now.

Mr. VEST. Yes; I understand they are building them larger, but this gun was actually tested with a charge of 776 pounds of powder, giving the projectile weighing 2,000 pounds an initial velocity of 1,832 feet a second, and with an initial energy, as it is called, of 46,580 foot-tons. And yet we talk about our cruisers and our defenses standing before such artillery as that!

Now look at our own condition. Upon last Saturday a gentleman appeared before the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, of which I have the honor to be a member, with the model of a sea-going vessel that he proposed to sell to the Government of the United States. The cost of that vessel was estimated at $2,000,000. The gentleman was Captain Lundborg, a Swedish naval architect and navigator. We invited the naval advisory board to be present and hear his statement. Finally it was suggested to this gentleman that a model should be built and that his experiment should be tested practically in this country. It was found out from Admiral Simpson, of the naval advisory board, that we never had a tank for testing any models in the United States; that there was no apparatus here for such purposes, and we were coolly told that we must send to Great Britain, or France, or Germany in order to test the model before we could pass upon its merits or demerits. Yet this is in a country with an overflowing treasury, over a hundred million dollars surplus annually, a defenseless seaboard, no navy, and no merchant marine.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Admitting all the Senator says, what remedy does he suggest in view of the situation? What ought we to do in the judgment of the Senator to remedy the matter?

Mr. VEST. The overwhelming necessity in this country now is the defense of our seaboard, for to-day we are practically at the mercy of the maritime powers of Europe. I do not deny the necessity for a navy, but I say that our first duty to the people of the United States is to defend the seacoast, and we can not do it with commerce-destroyers, with gunboats and steel cruisers of 4,000 tons and 4,500 tons burden.

The Senator asks me what to do. Take this money out of the Treasury that to-day is the fruitful source of all sorts of inventions for extravagance and even for fraud, and build five first-class iron-clads that can face the navies of the world and that can defend our seaboard both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. We are wasting this money day by day in the construction of naval pleasure-boats and commerce-destroyers. We have no commerce. Our cities to-day are in the hands of any maritime nation that chooses to attack them, and yet Senators say that we must build a navy when our seaboard itself is defenseless!

The remedy is in the application of the vast resources of the people of the United States to the immediate necessity before them. We are asked to expend now this additional $2,500,000 in the face of the statement that the four vessels now under contract with Mr. John Roach are a failure. The highest authority in Great Britain and in the United States has so pronounced them. In his report of November, 1883, which I have before me, Admiral Porter says that those vessels are not fit for war. He says that their sailing apparatus is defective and inefficient, and he calls the attention of the people of the United States and of the Government to the fact that coal is now made contraband of war by all the European powers, and therefore that unless they have this sail-power they are practically inefficient in the event of hostilities between us and any foreign nation. More than that, in the London Engineer, the highest authority on these subjects, an article appears, and it is entirely a responsible journal, which says:

In the design of the cruiser Chicago an English engineer and naval architect will find at every turn something defective. It is not easy to see for what she is intended; against ironclads she would be helpless. It is difficult to understand what purpose the inch-and-a-half steel deck is to serve; it is too thick for a deck and too thin for defense. There is no manner of protection provided for the men, save trumpery shields on the guns. There is good reason for doubting if the Chicago can ever be a fast vessel. Her engines are revivals of devices long since obsolete, and all the vices of American marine engineering manifest themselves. No English engineer in his senses would dream of putting in compound beam engines to drive twin screws. Defective as the engines are, they are admirable when compared to the boilers. To go to sea with such boilers is simply to court destruction.

Yet we are called upon to put in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy millions more to be paid out to the same contractor, as we know it will be, to build similar vessels.

Mr. President, I will not be disingenuous enough not to state that I am unwilling to put this amount of money in the hands of the present Secretary of the Navy, unless it be under overwhelming necessity and under limitations much more stringent than those found in the bill now before the Senate. When the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] rises upon this floor, as he has done more than once, and declares from his personal knowledge that the present Secretary of the Navy was the paid agent and lobbyist of John Roach for five years in this Capitol, when we see the contract for the construction of these new vessels given to Mr. Roach, when the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] stands here and reads the statement of a respectable man, a man of high character, to the effect that he would not bid upon these vessels because he could not have the same facilities for inspection that were afforded by the Navy Department to Mr. Roach, I must be pardoned for expressing my doubt as to the propriety of going further in the direction which we are now traveling.

As I have stated and as the Senator from Kentucky has said, naval power and commercial supremacy are inseparable. The Navy and the merchant marine must go together. They have declined together; they must advance together or cease to exist. There can be about this no sort of question, because you may build all the ships that you please, you may cover the ocean around your coast with armadas, you may construct marine artillery equal to any upon the globe, but unless you have the sailors with which to man the vessels, American sailors, such sailors as we had in the war of 1812, all these means and appliances will amount simply to nothing.

I wish to detain the Senate for a short time to examine into the causes which in my judgment led to the decadence of our Navy and of our merchant marine. To-day the bill before the Senate is constructed upon the very same ideas which Mr. John Roach and his colleague year year after year are attempting to impress upon Congress and upon the American people. We can not build ships, we can not make guns; yet Mr. Roach says you must not have ships and you must not have guns unless Americans can build the ships and make the guns. In all these long years of national dishonor and of national peril under this miserable, bigoted, and narrow policy, we have been listening to one or two men and their allies in the United States who say to us, "You shall not buy abroad," while they know and we know that we can not manufacture at home.

Every other nation upon the earth has torn down this system. There is not in all Christendom a single civilized nation except the United States that adheres to any such barbarism. Yet, as I said before, with 10,000 miles of seaboard, we listen to Mr. Roach and to this miserable cry, that until American ship-yards and American gun-makers can furnish these vessels of war and this artillery we must remain as we are.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Admitting the truth of what the Senator states in respect to the commercial marine (and I do not know that I differ from him in his views generally), it is important to ascertain the cause of the decadence. Is there any difference in the state of the laws with respect to the commercial marine between 1855 and the present time?

Mr. VEST. It is my purpose to answer that fully if the time will permit, but I will say to the Senator distinctly there is no difference in our mercantile laws. We have had since the year 1789 of blessed memory the very same navigation system substantially that we have to-day. I shall present in detail all the facts in regard to that matter, showing that the civil war did not cause this decline.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion it will be entirely as he prefers about it. There are matters that the Committee on Foreign Relations desire to bring before the Senate in executive session. So far as I am concerned I will express my willingness that the consideration of this bill shall cease for the present and that the Senate shall go into executive session in order that that matter may be taken up. I see the Senator is starting upon a new phase in his speech. Would it be agreeable to him to suspend his remarks and finish to-morrow, or would he prefer to go on to-night?

Mr. VEST. The only reason I speak upon the bill (I would prefer to speak upon the shipping bill, although the two subjects are indissolubly connected) is that I expect to leave the city day after to-morrow for home, and shall be gone some days.

Mr. HALE. I shall endeavor to call the bill up early in the morning after the routine business.

Mr. VEST. If the bill can be taken up soon in the morning I have no objection to yielding now, of course. I consult the convenience of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Then upon that intimation I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, giving notice that I shall endeavor to call the appropriation bill up in the morning after the routine business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 11 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 8, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. LORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we dispense with the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the formal introduction and reference of bills.

There was no objection.

The remainder of the Journal was then read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, for ten days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill H. R. 5692—this is a bill to adopt the revised international regulations to prevent collisions at sea—with a view to putting it upon its passage.

Mr. MILLS. Are we not to take up the business of the Territories to-day immediately after the reading of the Journal?

The SPEAKER. If the regular order is demanded, that will be the procedure.

Mr. MILLS. I have no objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas individually.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. If it will involve any discussion I shall demand the regular order.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I demand the regular order.

Mr. DUNN. I hope the gentleman will not insist until after we have passed this bill, which will lead to no debate, I think.

Mr. HARDEMAN. To-day has been set apart for the consideration of business from the Committee on the Territories, under the order of the House. We have only two days assigned for that business, and I insist upon the demand.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to make a statement. I wish to say that if I had been present on yesterday afternoon when the vote was taken on the Thompson resolution I should have voted "ay."

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to inquire whether it would be in order under the resolution adopted on yesterday to call up the unfinished business of the last legislative day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks that by the action of the House on yesterday this day was dedicated to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the Territories, and this has preference over all special orders or the unfinished business.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A PAIR.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to announce, since it was not done on yesterday, that on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] to suspend the rules and pass a bill to restore the duty on imported wool I was paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BINGHAM. He would have voted in favor of the motion; I would have voted against it.

L. B. COOK.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of presenting a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts. I am directed by the committee to report back the resolution which I send to the desk, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay L. B. Cook, out of the contingent fund of the House, a sum equal to the difference between the compensation received by him as fireman and assistant engineer in charge of the House elevator, at $1,200 per annum, from the 22d of February, 1883.

The resolution and report were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills reported from the Committee on the Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair).

BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND TEXAS.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire, under the rule of the House adopted on yesterday and under instructions from the Committee on Territories, to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 1565) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas conflicting claims are asserted, respectively, by the State of Texas and the United States to that portion of territory lying between the North Fork of Red River and the South Fork (or Prairie-Dog-Town Fork) of Red River, the same being claimed by the State of Texas, and so designated on its maps as Greer County, and also claimed by the United States as part of the Indian Territory; and

Whereas in consequence of said conflicting claims great difficulty and confusion exist, and the exercise of governmental functions between the respective claimants over said territory is much embarrassed and obstructed; and

Whereas the State of Texas has authorized the appointment of a commission, to act with a similar commission to be appointed by the United States, to settle and establish the boundary lines of said territory so respectively claimed; and

Whereas it is desirable and important that a settlement of these conflicting claims should be had, to the end that the said question of boundary now in dispute may be settled: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint a commission of three persons, who shall be well versed in the laws governing boundary lines, and one of whom shall be a practical engineer, or if, in the pleasure of the President, it is deemed more expedient, to detail one or more competent engineers of the Army, who, in conjunction with such person or persons as may be appointed by the State of Texas, shall, at such time in the near future as may be indicated by the President, official notice of which time shall be given by him to the governor of Texas at least one month in advance of the actual service of such commission, run and mark the boundary line between said portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas now in controversy; and said commission shall, as far as possible, ascertain and determine the Red River indicated and intended by the treaty between the United States and Spain of date February 22, 1819. In running and marking said boundary line the said commission shall proceed as follows: Beginning at the point where a line drawn from the point where the thirty-second degree of north latitude crosses the western bank of the Sabine River, crossing Red River, and thence following the course of said Red River westwardly to the degree of longitude one hundred west from London and twenty-three degrees west from Washington, as laid down in Melish's map of the United States published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818. Said commission will report their action in the premises, upon the completion thereof, to the Secretary of the Interior, with all necessary notes, maps, and other papers, in order that in determining this part of the boundary between the Indian Territory and the State of Texas it may be definitely settled whether the North Fork or the South Fork (or Prairie-Dog-Town Fork) of said river is the main or true Red River contemplated in said treaty; and the said Secretary of the Interior shall transmit the said report of such commission to Congress at the next session thereof after such report may be made, for action by Congress.

SEC. 2. That when the main or true Red River is by said commission ascertained, then such land-mark as shall plainly indicate and define the same as a corner shall be erected at the point where the one hundredth degree of longitude west from Greenwich crosses Red River.

SEC. 3. That the sum of —— dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided, That the same shall be applied only to the commission appointed by the United States.

Mr. LANHAM. I call for the reading of the report.

The report is as follows:

Mr. LANHAM, from the Committee on the Territories, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 1565):

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1565) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary line between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas, in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas, respectfully submit the following report:

The object of the bill is the ascertainment of the dividing line between a part of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas, through the instrumentality of a commission, the results of whose investigations are to be hereafter submitted to Congress, in order to settle a question of confusion of boundary.

The Legislature of the State of Texas, on the 2d May, 1882, passed an act authorizing the governor of that State to appoint a commission to act in conjunction with a similar commission on the part of the United States for the purpose stated in this bill; and it is now proposed to raise the commission on the part of the United States, and to direct its action in the premises, affording thereby an opportunity to the State of Texas to co-operate with the United States in the determination of the facts out of which the controversy arises. For more than a quarter of a century it has been contended by the State of Texas that the boundary line between a portion of the Indian Territory and that State is what is now known as the North Fork of Red River up to the degrees of longitude 100 west from London and 23 west from Washington. It is claimed by the United States that what is now known as the South Fork of Red River is the boundary.

The territory lying between these two streams is that which is in dispute. It is distinctively known in Texas as Greer County, and so designated on the maps of that State. If the North Fork be the boundary this tract of country is a part of Texas; if the South Fork be the boundary, it is a part of the Indian Territory. In extent it is approximately 2,400 square miles. The dispute has its inception in the different constructions and understandings which obtain as to the true meaning and intention of the contracting parties in the treaties between the United States and Spain of date February 22, 1819, and the United States and Mexico of date January 12, 1828, with reference to the boundary line between the different countries as therein designated. So much of said treaties as is here pertinent reads as follows:

"The boundary line between the two countries, west of the Mississippi, shall begin on the Gulf of Mexico at the mouth of the River Sabine, in the sea, continuing north along the western bank of that river to the thirty-second degree of latitude, thence by a line due north to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Nachitoches, or Red River; then following the course of the Rio Roxo westward to the degree of longitude 100° west from London and 23° from Washington. * * * The whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818." (Vide U. S. Stat. at Large, relating to public treaties, pp. 713, 474.)

Texas was admitted into the Union upon this boundary line (27th December, 1845). The said Melish's map is now on file in the State Department, and upon it only one stream is laid down as Red River, and that is shown to be a continuous stream, without fork or tributaries, until after it passes far beyond the said meridian. At the dates of said treaties, but one stream was known as Red River. Subsequent explorations have discovered the fact that there exists two streams (North and South Forks of Red River) which flow together before said degree of longitude is reached, and the point of controversy is which of these streams is the Red River contemplated and intended by said treaties "as laid down on Melish's map?" While it is not the purpose of this committee to express any opinion as to the relative merits of the conflicting claims to this territory, or to declare in favor of the title of either party, believing as they do that the investigations of the commission to be appointed ought to be free and untrammeled, still by way of formulating the nature and importance of the controversy, and emphasizing the necessity for its adjustment, it is considered not improper to submit the following statement, designed as evidentiary of the existence and magnitude of the question. For years, by the executive, legislative, and (in part) judicial authority of Texas, this territory has been claimed as being within the jurisdiction of that State.

In 1860, General Sam. Houston, who was then governor of Texas, in speaking of this matter said:

"The traditionary history of Indian tribes along its banks, the evidence of Marcy's survey, and the prominent features laid down in Melish's map alike established the fact that the North Fork is the main prong of Red River."—Letter to William H. Russell, 28th of April, 1860.

E. M. Pease, ex-governor of Texas, who began his investigations upon this subject in 1853, said:

"From a review of all the facts and circumstances, I am forced to the conclusion that Greer County (territory in dispute) rightfully belongs to Texas."—Letter to John M. Swisher, October 3, 1882.

Ex-governor O. M. Roberts, and ex-chief-justice of the supreme court of Texas, said:

"When the line may be run, * * * and with a knowledge of all the facts, the territory of Greer County, between the forks of the two streams, will be found to belong to Texas."—Special message to Texas Legislature, January 10, 1883.

Governor John Ireland, among other things, says:

"Inasmuch as this State feels that she has a perfect title to the territory (Greer County), I respectfully and earnestly urge such steps on the part of the United States as will enable the joint commission to be raised. * * * I am aware that the Secretary of the Interior holds that the territory belongs to the United States; we are no less confident that the territory belongs to Texas."—Letter to President Arthur, August 24, 1883.

By the Legislature of Texas this territory has been indicated as an integral part of the State, defined and designated as Greer County (Revised Statutes of Texas, page 132); it has been placed in land districts (Id., 548); its vacant and unappropriated public domain has been set apart, one half for public free schools for the education of children in Texas without reference to race or color, and the other half for the payment of the State debt (Acts Sixteenth Legislature, page 16); it has been placed in judicial districts (Acts Sixteenth Legislature, page 28; Acts Seventeenth Legislature, page 8); it has been included in State senatorial and representative districts, and is a part of the eleventh Congressional district of that State.

In August, 1881, one James S. Irwin was indicted in the (State) district court of Wheeler County, Texas (to which county the territory now in dispute had by statute been attached for judicial purposes), for the murder of one Bryson, committed in Greer County. The defendant was brought to trial. A plea to the jurisdiction of the court was by him entered, upon the ground that Greer County was not a part of Texas nor subject to its jurisdiction. The said district court, Hon. Frank Willis, judge, overruled the plea, held that Greer County was a part of Texas, and that her courts had cognizance of offenses therein committed. Bryson was convicted of murder in the first degree, his punishment assessed by the jury at imprisonment in the penitentiary for life, was sentenced accordingly, and is now serving a life-term in the State prison of Texas.

In a still more recent case before the same judge it was sought by parties owning property in Greer County to resist the payment of taxes to the authorities of Texas, and by injunction to restrain the collection thereof, because it was alleged that Greer County was a part of the Indian Territory. The court upon hearing dissolved the injunction, and held that the assessment and collection of taxes in the said Territory by the officials of Texas was legal, thus again deciding in favor of the jurisdiction and dominion of Texas over the tract of country in controversy.—Letters of Judge Willis to Mr. Lanham, dated October 19, 1883, and December 27, 1883.

This will serve to show with what earnestness the claim of Texas is asserted.

On the other hand it is maintained with equal earnestness by the Secretary of the Interior that the territory in controversy is a part of the Indian Territory, and much has been recited by the Department of the Interior in support of the claim of the United States. (Senate Ex. Doc. No. 70, Forty-seventh Congress, first session; extract from Report of the Secretary of the Interior for 1877 on Texas boundary.) Much interesting information on this subject can also be had by consulting Senate Doc. No. 54, Thirty-second Congress, second session, which contains the exploration of the Red River of Louisiana, in the year 1852, by Randolph B. Marcy.

This bill may be regarded in the nature of a revival of an act of Congress passed June 5, 1858 (Vol. 11., U. S. Stat. at Large, p. 311), providing for a Texas boundary commission, and is really no new measure. In 1854 (11th February) the Legislature of Texas passed an act authorizing the appointment of a commission to co-operate with a similar commission of the United States to ascertain the identical boundary line now sought to be discovered, and in 1858, as above stated, Congress responded to the efforts of Texas by raising the commission; but no final report has ever been made in the premises, and the matter remains to all intents and purposes as if nothing had been done. This question has received some attention from the Forty-seventh Congress. In December, 1881, a bill (No. 1715) was introduced in the House to define the boundary between the Indian Territory and the State of Texas, the purport of which was to affirmatively settle the question without the intervention of a commission, and to relinquish all claim by the United States to the territory in dispute. The committee to whom that bill was referred, while expressing an opinion adverse to the title of Texas to the disputed territory, still say:

"It is manifest, therefore, that some means should be taken to settle this dispute as soon as possible. Conflicts are arising between the United States authorities and persons claiming to exercise rights on the disputed tract under the jurisdiction of the State of Texas; bloodshed and even death has resulted from this conflict." (H. R. Report No. 1282, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.)

"But inasmuch as the claim is disputed, and that with the earnestness of belief on the part of Texas, and inasmuch as none of the surveys referred to have been made with the privity of the State of Texas, the joint commission appointed (act June 5, 1858) having failed to act in concert, your committee are of the opinion that that State should have a hearing in the matter, and should have an opportunity to co-operate with the United States in settling the facts upon which the question in dispute rests. A substitute is reported for the appointment of a joint commission, the passage of which is recommended." (Id., p. 4.)

No action was had at that Congress upon the joint resolution (No. 223) which accompanied the report from which the above extracts are made.

On the 24th January, 1882, there was introduced in the Senate a bill (S. 954) creating a commission as contemplated in the bill now under consideration. It passed the Senate, but has received no final attention upon the part of the House, so far as your committee is advised. Many important considerations suggest the necessity of the passage of this bill; questions of jurisdiction, of revenue taxation, of title to real estate, of the settlement and development of the country, of public peace, and others of kindred nature, all combine in support of this measure. The question of title to the disputed territory is pretermitted in the bill, and its object is the raising of the commission for the ascertainment of facts as a basis for the future action of Congress. Your committee, therefore, recommend that the bill with the amendments hereinafter suggested do pass, and further, that it receive the consideration of the House at the earliest possible opportunity.

AMENDMENTS.

In the fourth line, section 3, page 4 of the bill, between the words "act" and "provided" insert the words "the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose——

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Texas will permit me to interrupt him, I understand that this will give rise to some debate, and I ask unanimous consent now that the debate be limited to one hour, to be divided equally between the two sides of the House.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I think this bill is here under a misapprehension. I think the object of the House in passing the rule which was presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania the other day was intended in good faith to give two days for the consideration of legislation in relation to the Territories directly. Instead of that here is a boundary dispute between the United States and the State of Texas, and I submit to the chairman of the Committee on the Territories that this ought to be laid aside by general consent.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I have no option in the matter. The committee directed me to call up the bills in the order in which they appear upon the Calendar. This bill is embraced within the terms of the resolution adopted on yesterday and is here now for consideration. I repeat that I have no volition in the matter, but am acting in obedience to the instructions of the committee.

Mr. REED. This bill will give rise to much discussion and take up the time which was given to the Territories for other purposes.

Mr. LANHAM. What time does the gentleman from Maine want?

Mr. REED. As far as I am individually concerned, only a few moments; but so far as the rest of the House is concerned it may take considerable time, for it is an important matter, and will prevent the consideration of other business for the Territories.

Mr. LANHAM. It simply relates to the creation of a commission to determine a question of dispute. It is not a question of title at all, but simply a settlement of a matter of dispute as to lands claimed by the Secretary of the Interior on one side, as a part of the Indian Territory, and the State of Texas on the other as a part of the State of Texas. All that this bill seeks to do is simply to raise a commission.

Mr. REED. I think it means more than that.

Mr. HORR. I submit to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] that that is a very mild statement of this case. I have given it a good deal of attention. It involves a question between the United States Government and the State of Texas as to a tract of land twice as large as the State of Rhode Island. It involves a question of the old original treaty between Mexico and the United States.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I can not yield for a discussion of the question on its merits.

Mr. HORR. I do not see how the bill comes in here under the resolution of the House adopted yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS].

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour, to be equally divided between the friends of the bill and those opposed to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The ordinary method in limiting debate is for the committee to rise and have the order made by the House. Debate can only be limited in committee by unanimous consent.

Mr. HORR. I certainly must object.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make this suggestion to the gentleman from South Carolina: that this bill be allowed to lie over until the next day assigned for the consideration of business from the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. LANHAM. I will say to the gentleman from New York that it is very important that this question should be settled. The bill is reported by the Committee on the Territories with a unanimous recommendation in favor of its passage. The Secretary of the Interior, representing the United States, in a letter transmitted by the President to Congress, recommends that a commission be appointed.

Mr. REED. But not this bill.

Mr. LANHAM. He recommends the appointment of a commission; and the Secretary of the Interior had before him the act of the State of Texas which is almost in every respect similar to the bill now proposed.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I do not intend to discuss the merits of the bill at this time, but only to answer what has been said. I do not see what great harm action on this bill can do. As stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], it simply authorizes a commission to go and lay out the boundary and report their action to Congress. Nothing they do can have any legal effect until Congress takes action. In other words, it is nothing but a simple inquiry into the facts of the boundary line between Texas and the Indian Territory.

Mr. HISCOCK. If my suggestion is acted upon there will certainly be but a brief postponement; and if it be at all right and fair the postponement can do it no harm. It will give the members of this House an opportunity to investigate the matter and to advise themselves in reference to the merits of the bill and the opposition to it, if any. If it stands over in that way we can all be fully posted, and the result will be, if there should really be no reasonable objection to it, there will be substantially no debate.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I should like very much indeed if it were in my power to accommodate my friends; but I stand here under instructions of the committee asking the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman see any objection to my proposition? When is the next day that is assigned to the committee?

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. The 13th of May.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly no harm can be done between now and the 13th of May, and in the mean time there will be an opportunity for members to investigate the matter.

Mr. REAGAN addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that what is now proceeding is altogether informal and outside the rule.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. If we can not have unanimous consent to limit debate, I shall move that the committee rise for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that objection is made to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour. Thereupon the gentleman moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1565) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas, in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the pending bill. And pending that motion I move that all general debate on the bill be limited to one hour, to be equally divided between the friends and opponents of the measure.

Mr. REED. I make the point that there has been no general debate in the committee; and I suggest that the debate can not be limited until after it has been entered upon.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] took the floor and commenced to speak.

Mr. REED. There has been no general debate. The gentleman from Texas did not begin his speech.

The SPEAKER. Of course the present occupant of the chair has no information on that subject except the statements of the gentlemen on the floor. If it be a fact that general debate had not commenced on the bill, then under the rules of the House the Chair thinks it would not be in order at this time to move to limit general debate.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. The gentleman from Texas did take the floor and commence his argument; and I interrupted him to ask unanimous consent for the limiting of general debate.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman from Texas had got as far as "Mr. Chairman," which to my mind does not constitute general debate, however debatable the chairman might be.

Mr. REAGAN. The wit of the gentleman from Maine is made at the expense of facts. There was not much debate, but there was more than he states.

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair has no information upon that subject except what is now stated on the floor. One gentleman insists there was debate; another insists there was not.

Mr. REED. I suppose the Journal Clerk ought to be able to state what is the fact, or the Chair ought to have some authentic information from some source.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I am satisfied that the notes of the reporter will show that the gentleman did commence his speech.

The SPEAKER. As at present advised the Chair sees no way to determine the matter except to submit to the House the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS]. The gentleman moves that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and pending that motion he moves that all general debate upon the bill under consideration in that committee be limited to one hour.

Mr. REED. But if the Chair please, I make the point of order that that motion can not be made until after general debate has begun in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is correct under the rules of the House.

Mr. REED. There must be some means of ascertaining the fact. I am speaking according to my understanding of it; of course I may be mistaken.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Gentlemen who were much nearer did hear debate.

Mr. REED. If the Chair please, I am aware that this is a new question in its present aspect, for the simple reason that no body ever before undertook to stop general debate upon a bill until after the first speaker had concluded. I submit to the Chair that the true ruling would be that general debate can not be closed until the first speaker has finished.

The SPEAKER. This is one of the matters upon which the chairman of the Committee of the Whole never makes any report to the House, and therefore the presiding officer of the House has no means of ascertaining officially whether general debate had been begun or not.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. The facts are simply these: the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] had taken the floor and commenced his speech. I asked him to yield to me for the purpose of obtaining unanimous consent of the committee to limit general debate to one hour. Those are the facts.

Mr. REED. And as unanimous consent was refused, thereupon the gentleman from Texas resumed the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Official Reporter of Debates taking notes at the time that there was in fact no general debate. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] rose, addressed the chair, and began a sentence, then yielded to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS], and afterward the committee rose.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will perceive that my statement in regard to "Mr. Chairman" was not at the expense of accuracy.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole and resumes consideration of the bill (H. R. 1565) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary line between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM]. I would inquire of him how much time he desires.

Mr. LANHAM. I do not propose to occupy more than a few minutes; I think possibly fifteen minutes will be sufficient for all that I desire to say.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Then I yield to the gentleman for fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] is entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. LANHAM. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I would like very much if the gentleman would kindly address himself to the suggestion made by me, that is, that the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary last year by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Willits] be adopted as a substitute for the pending bill, and then I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. LANHAM. I will endeavor to give due consideration to the suggestion of the gentleman. As I stated before, this bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Territories, and they have recommended that it be considered in the House at the earliest practicable opportunity.

This bill is practically in the nature of an order of survey made in an action of ejectment, where parties litigant are laying claim to the same tract of land, and there is a question of confusion of boundary. In this particular case the State of Texas insists that she is entitled to a certain tract of territory; the United States, through the Secretary of the Interior, insists that the title to that tract of country is in the United States. Now, what we seek is to have a commission to go upon the ground, examine the locus in quo, ascertain the facts and report the same to this or to a succeeding Congress, in order that proper action may be taken so as to settle the matter in controversy.

I have prepared a crude diagram, not very accurate nor yet very elegant; but I hope it will subserve me for the purpose of illustrating the matter now under consideration. Under the treaty between Spain and the United States of date February 22, 1819, and the treaty between the United States and Mexico of date January 12, 1828, so much of the boundary therein agreed upon as is here pertinent is as follows, which I read:

The boundary line between the two countries, west of the Mississippi, shall begin on the Gulf of Mexico at the mouth of the river Sabine, in the sea, continuing north along the western bank of that river to the thirty-second degree of latitude, thence by a line due north to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Nachitoches, or Red River; then following the course of the Rio Roxo westward to the degree of longitude 100 west from London and 23 from Washington. * * * The whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818. (Vide U. S. Stat. at Large, relating to public treaties, pp. 713, 474.)

The State of Texas was admitted into this Union upon the same boundary. Now, the Melish map, which is made a part of those treaties, shows the Red River to be one continuous stream until after it passes the one hundredth degree of longitude. In 1819, when this first treaty was made, this was an unknown land; and I think I may safely assert that no topographer had ever visited that country. Neither Melish himself nor any other had ventured that far on the frontier at that time. Hence it may safely be assumed that the Red River as here laid down is merely a supposititious or conjectural delineation of that stream. Subsequent explorations made thirty years afterward have discovered the fact that instead of the Red River being one continuous stream, as laid down on Melish's map, until after it passes the one hundredth meridian, there are two streams, as I have indicated on the diagram which I hold in my hand.

This [illustrating] represents the Indian Territory; this the State of Texas; this the Red River east of the confluence of the two streams; this the North Fork of the Red River; this what is known as the South Fork of that river.

The United States, through the Secretary of the Interior, claims that the South Fork of the Red River is the boundary. The State of Texas claims that the North Fork of the Red River is the boundary. I have indicated by an interrogation point upon this diagram the point of dispute.

Now, if the South Fork is the boundary, that land [illustrating] belongs to the United States and is a part of the Indian Territory. If the North Fork is the boundary, it belongs to Texas. It is distinctively known in Texas as Greer County. We in Texas have believed for more than a quarter of a century that this land belongs to Texas; that the North Fork is the real Red River contemplated and intended in Melish's map, which was made a part of the treaty.

But it is contended with great earnestness by the Secretary of the Interior that this land belongs to the United States. This controversy has existed for a long time. Under different political administrations of the State of Texas the chief executives of that State have insisted upon the fact that this land belongs to the State of Texas. They have made applications to the Congress of the United States in more than one instance for a co-operative commission to be created by Congress, to act with a similar commission on the part of the State of Texas. In May, 1882, the Legislature of my State passed an act creating a commission so far as Texas was concerned, to co-operate with a similar commission to be appointed by the United States to run and mark this boundary and to determine in point of fact which one of these two streams is the main Red River. The governor of my State, Hon. John Ireland, in August of last year wrote a letter to the President of the United States transmitting a copy of the act of the Legislature of Texas. That letter was referred by the President to the Secretary of the Interior. This officer investigated the question with the act of the State of Texas before him, not essentially dissimilar from the bill now proposed, and returned his opinion to the President, who then transmitted that letter to Congress for its consideration in a special message.

Now, here is the State of Texas asking the United States for a commission to assist in settling this question of confusion of boundary. The controversy arises from what a lawyer would designate as a latent ambiguity. We do not know in point of fact which one of these streams is the Red River. It is necessary to go upon the ground to get authentic facts upon which this or a future Congress can act.

The Committee on the Territories has expressly pretermitted any question of the consideration of title whatsoever, and has limited itself to a statement of the controversy which unquestionably exists.

Now, the Secretary of the Interior, with all the lights before him, with all the facts gathered from his predecessors in office—because in 1858 there was a commission created on the part of Congress to go there and co-operate with Texas in surveying the lines between that State and the Territories of the United States—the Secretary of the Interior with much information before him, including our Texas statute upon the subject, submitted a letter from which I will quote. Having recited the statute of Texas, taking it up seriatim, he comes to this conclusion:

It will be seen from the foregoing that the question of the disputed boundary has never been determined between the United States and the State of Texas. The latter State desires a speedy adjustment of the question, and in view of the settlement of the territory in controversy and the claims made to the tracts of land lying therein, and in view of the civil jurisdiction which prevails or ought to prevail therein, it is important that such boundary line should be finally fixed and determined. The question—

Now listen—

The question to be determined is which fork of the Red River was intended under the treaties and joint resolutions before recited to mark and designate the boundary between Texas and the United States. I submit that this does not necessarily depend upon the relative size or formation of the forks. I am of opinion—that it is necessary that a joint commission on the part of the United States and Texas should be formed to determine definitely such boundary line, and recommend that proper steps be taken for that purpose.

This is the language of the Secretary of the Interior—

The Secretary of the Interior, as I have stated, had before him the act of the State of Texas upon this subject; and he comes to the conclusion which I have read. I might read from the report of the Judiciary Committee of the last Congress, a part of which is embodied in the report of the Committee on Territories, saying that it is manifestly necessary that some steps should be taken to settle this question.

It may not be improper for me to state that a bill almost identical with that now before the Committee of the Whole was passed in the Senate of the United States during the last Congress. I may further be permitted to state that the Committee on Territories has reported the identical bill now under consideration in the Senate.

So there seems to be no doubt now as to the propriety of trying to settle this question. Both the different political sovereignties with common consensus unite in the opinion that there ought to be a settlement of it.

The Secretary of the Interior, representing the Government of the United States in this respect, asks for a commission. The State of Texas asks for a commission. There is no doubt that the controversy exists. There is no question of title raised by the bill. Texas may be able to do without the tract of land in controversy, the United States may be able to do without it, but neither of these political sovereignties can afford to have the dispute perpetuated. All we ask in this bill, Mr. Chairman—and let me state it again—is an order for a surveying commission to go and ascertain the facts and report the same to Congress.

As further emphasizing the controversy which exists between the two governments, I hold in my hand, to which I invite attention, an official map of the Indian Territory, placing as part of the Indian Territory this tract between two forks of Red River. I have also before me an official copy of the map of Texas, which lays down as a county in Texas (Greer County) the very land claimed as part of the Indian Territory by the United States authorities. I wish to state one further fact. What is now known as the South Fork of the Red River, at the date of these treaties and at the date of the admission of Texas into the Union, was not known as any part of Red River. On the contrary, it was called Kechi-ah-qui-hono, which in Indian nomenclature means Prairie-Dog-Town River.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask a moment more.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina I will yield to the gentleman from Texas what further time he requires to conclude his remarks.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, responding to the request of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] I have this to say: I do not believe that the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session of Congress is sufficiently comprehensive and explicit to fully invite and direct the attention and control the action of the commission which should go there for the ascertainment of all the facts which are necessary to settle this question. That bill merely recites what the treaty is. I have taken the language of the treaty myself in this bill and made the initial point where the thirty-second parallel of latitude crosses the western bank of the Sabine River, then running by line due north to where it strikes the Red River, then following the course of Red River westward; and in making the survey it provides they shall determine, as far as possible, which one of these two rivers is the stream indicated by Melish's map.

If we take the report of the Judiciary Committee as made at the last session of Congress, or rather the substitute reported, it leaves to the arbitrary caprice or inclination of the commission to say where the one hundredth meridian crosses the Red River. Their attention is not directed to the fact that there are two streams known as Red River by that substitute. Nothing of that sort is done. There is no use of going and making a survey unless we procure some authentic and satisfactory evidence of the fact as to which one of these streams is the Red River. There is no question about the fact that the one hundredth meridian crosses both these streams, but Texas and the Secretary of the Interior of the United States ask that this question as to the real Red River of Melish's map shall be settled and that we shall have this commission to go on the ground and gather all the facts and report them to the Secretary of the Interior who shall in turn report them to Congress, and upon that information, so communicated, Congress shall act and either relegate this territory to Texas or hold that it belongs to the United States. There ought to be an end of the controversy and such means employed in the solution thereof as will offer some hopes of its consummation.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty-two minutes remaining of his hour.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I have not either as an individual or as a Representative the slightest interest where this portion of territory shall go, whether it shall be adjudged to belong to the United States or adjudged to belong to the State of Texas; all I care to have is the settlement of this question upon a basis of what is just and right. I have repeately offered to the gentleman from Texas to agree to the passage of the resolution which I shall move as a substitute for the one presented by him.

I want this House to understand what this discussion is about, because they have already by inattention in a past Congress complicated this matter by inadvertent legislation. In an act of Congress dated February 24, 1879, the legislation of the United States has located this county—for it is claimed to be a county—inside one of the judicial districts of Texas. Now, that was done not only without the knowledge of the House but also, I am informed, without the knowledge of the members from Texas. At least they never intended to forestall this question by any snap judgment or by any indirection. They not only tell us so but we all know that is so.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a suggestion?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. If the gentleman will permit me I will state to him that the bill to which he refers was passed by Congress before there was a dispute on this boundary question. At that time there was no dispute whatever upon that point, and therefore the gentleman will see that there is a marked difference between the conditions existing then and now.

Mr. REED. I am very glad, Mr. Chairman, for the purposes of this discussion to have that statement made by the gentleman from Texas, because when we come to judge of this subject finally it will be a matter of importance, since it will show that it was not an intentional thing on the part of Congress.

But, sir, let me call the attention of the House to the fact that at the time Melish's map was made and at the time that the treaty was made by which we acquired Texas but one Red River was known, and that was the south fork of the Red River, and Melish's map shows it as plainly as any chartography can show anything on the face of the earth.

Now, there is but one opinion in the mind of any disinterested man who has examined the subject, and there can not be the slightest doubt of the fact that this territory in dispute and to which claim is made by the State of Texas belongs to the Indian Territory. All that is necessary then for Congress to do is to avoid ambiguous language which will transfer this territory which already belongs to us. Now, then, the point is this, simple and plain: Where on Melish's map did the one hundredth meridian cross the Red River? Did it cross it upon the northwest corner of Greer County or did it cross on the southwestern corner of that county? That point settled, the whole question in dispute is settled. That is the whole question presented. I repeat it whether on Melish's map, under the terms of the treaty, this point is in one place or another? How does this bill approach that subject? Instead of putting that point plainly and distinctly I believe that there will be a confusion created in the minds of every gentleman who has his attention directed to the subject. The language of the treaty is not used in the terms of the bill, but language is used which is satisfactory to the Representatives from the State of Texas.

Now I say this——

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him to read the language of the treaty?

Mr. REED. Most surely.

Mr. LANHAM. The language of that part of the treaty is as follows:

Thence by a line due north to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Natchitoches or Red River; then following the course of the Rio Roxo westward to the degree of longitude 100 west from London and 23 from Washington; then crossing the said Red River, and running thence by a line due north to the river Arkansas, &c.

That is the very language of the treaty itself. Now, the committee did not believe it was necessary to begin at the mouth of the river, in the sea, and survey all along up the river to find the point at issue; but we limited the application of the language to the point in controversy.

Mr. REED. That is the language of the treaty with a "but." Now let us have the language without any "but."

Mr. LANHAM. Does the gentleman think it is necessary, as I have said, to begin at salt-water and survey all the way up the river in order to determine the point at issue?

Mr. REED. I maintain that it is necessary to do precisely what the Willits bill calls for; that is, to mark the point where this meridian crosses Red River in the language of the treaty; and if you want to do that I am with you, otherwise I am not. Now, the point for this House to consider is whether it will adopt a bill recommended by a tribunal entirely disinterested in the question, or will it adopt a bill which is advocated word for word by the Representatives of the State of Texas, a party interested in this matter?

Now we all know, Mr. Chairman, that this question was before the Judiciary Committee last year. Why was it not there this year? Is it not a judicial question?

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman permit me to answer that?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. LANHAM. I will do it with the permission of the gentleman. This bill in the Senate went to the Committee on the Territories. That, in my judgment, is the proper committee for its consideration. Why should it go to the Committee on the Judiciary?

All proposed legislation—

I read from the rule—

shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows: Subjects relating,

4. to judicial proceedings, civil and criminal law: to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Is there any judicial proceeding in this matter? Is there any civil or criminal law involved in it? None whatever. It is a mere question of fact—the ascertainment of the dividing line between Texas and a part of the Indian Territory.

What comes under the jurisdiction of the Territories?

Subjects relating to Territorial legislation, the revision thereof, and affecting Territories or the admission of States.

Mr. REED. The Indian Territory is not a Territory in the sense of that rule.

Mr. LANHAM. If the gentleman from Maine can find anything under that clause of the rule which I have just read which prohibits the Committee on the Territories from considering this matter, then I must say that he has succeeded in finding what I have not found. The authority is clearly lodged in the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. REED. The Indian Territory, I repeat, is not an organized Territory, and the question here involved is not necessarily a question which under the rule the gentleman has quoted would go to the Committee on the Territories. On the contrary, it is a judicial question, and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in the last Congress? That committee made a report upon the subject. It was made by Mr. Willits of Michigan. Every man here knows that he is a fair man—every man in the last Congress who met him; and his judgment of this question was embodied in this bill; and I think an effort was made to get it up but it failed.

Now, I want to call your attention exactly to the provisions of this bill of Mr. Willits. I ask you if it does not present a square statement of facts, and, if so, why it is desired to change it?

Whereas the treaty between the United States and Spain, executed February 22, 1819, fixed the boundary line between the two countries, west of the Mississippi River, as follows: Beginning on the Gulf of Mexico at the mouth of the Sabine River, in the sea, and continuing north along the western bank of that river to the thirty-second degree of latitude; thence by a line due north to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Nachitoches or Red River; thence following the course of the Rio Roxo westward to the one hundredth degree of longitude west from London and the twenty-third from Washington; thence crossing the said Red River and running thence by a line due north to the river Arkansas; thence following the course of the southern bank of the Arkansas to its source, in latitude forty-two degrees north; and thence by that parallel of latitude to the South Sea; the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818; and

Whereas a controversy exists between the United States and Texas as to the point where the one hundredth degree of longitude crosses the Red River, as described in the treaty; and

Whereas the point of crossing has never been ascertained and fixed by any authority competent to bind the United States and Texas; and

Whereas it is desirable that a settlement of this controversy should be had, to the end that the question of boundary, now in dispute because of a difference of opinion as to said crossing, may also be settled: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to detail one or more officers of the Army—

Men from their occupation disinterested—

who, in conjunction with such person or persons as may be appointed by the State of Texas, shall ascertain and mark the point where the one hundredth meridian of longitude crosses Red River—

Now, one objection that was made to this was that it does not say where the Red River crosses the one hundredth meridian. If the Red River crosses the one hundredth meridian and the one hundredth meridian crosses the Red River, very likely it will be about at the same point.

Mr. LANHAM. But the one hundredth meridian crosses both these streams.

Mr. REED. The question is, Which is the Red River according to Melish's map—in accordance with the terms of the treaty——

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman state what is the difference in the language of the proposed bill?

Mr. REED. I will show that when I get through the reading of this—and the person or persons appointed by virtue of this act shall make report of his or their action in the premises to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall transmit the same to Congress, at the next session thereof after such report may be made, for action by Congress.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the War Department, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of the United States in carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

Now I ask this House why that is not a fair thing? Why is it that something else is wanted?

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. Was the gentleman from Maine in favor of that bill at the last Congress?

Mr. REED. Upon my word I can not say; but I think I voted for the report.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. The gentleman from Maine voted for it in committee.

Mr. REAGAN. I asked the question because I understood the gentleman from Maine was opposed to it.

Mr. REED. I think not. The reason I hesitated in answering the gentleman from Texas was that I could not recollect when the bill was brought up in committee and thought it possible it might have been brought up in my absence. I do not recollect having any feeling in the matter, except this, that if Mr. Willits had taken hold and examined the matter and came to the conclusion that it was a proper bill it was all right.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman from Maine point out the difference between the bills?

Mr. REED. It is difficult for me to point out——

Mr. MILLER, of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to say that the Territory of New Mexico was settled by the Mexicans. One or the other of these streams extends up into New Mexico. Which one is it? That will determine what was meant by the Red River by the Mexicans when they made the treaty.

Mr. REED. The question is, what is shown by Melish's map?

Mr. MILLER, of Texas. Melish got his information——

Mr. REED. I do not care where he got his information. But here is his map. Both parties in referring to that treaty said that the location was as laid down in Melish's map:

The whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818.

It was not merely a verbal description, but it was a verbal description tied to a map and covered by a map.

Mr. MILLER, of Texas. Melish did not know where the Red River was.

Mr. REED. I do not care whether Melish knew where the Red River was or not. The question is where he said the river was.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Maine point out the difference between the two bills.

Mr. REED. It is difficult for me to do that, because the second bill contains a complete change of phraseology.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. I ask the gentleman to state what is the difference between the bill of Mr. Willits and the bill before the House?

Mr. REED. If there is not any difference, why do you object to the other bill?

Mr. JONES, of Texas. Why do you oppose this bill?

Mr. REED. Because the bill I hold in my hand goes directly to the point and the other does not. The other goes into a long talk about the Dog-Town Fork of the Red River with an Indian name to it, and all sorts of matters imported into it which do not belong to the treaty or the discussion. We want it confined directly to the point.

Mr. HAMMOND. If the gentleman from Maine will permit me, I will say that this second bill uses this language:

That when the main or true Red River is by said commission ascertained, then such landmark as shall plainly indicate and define the same as a corner shall be erected at the point where the one hundredth degree of longitude west from Greenwich crosses Red River.

The point is that the true river on Melish's map is ascertained; and this bill is to render uncertain what is now certain by the treaty.

Mr. REED. Precisely.

Mr. HAMMOND. Whether the map is right or wrong, the treaty was made by the map.

Mr. REED. That is it, precisely.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then Melish's map ought to be repeated in this second section.

Mr. REED. No; we ought to adopt this other bill.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I stated a while ago that when the act of 1879 was passed by Congress this dispute and confusion about the boundary of Texas was not prominent in the minds of members who supported that bill. There was no intention to conclude the United States on this question. I supported the bill myself from the Committee on the Judiciary. The fact is that this confusion about the boundary between Texas and the Indian Nation arose as far back as 1854, and Congress passed an act in 1854 or 1855 to settle this very dispute. The commissioners on the part of the United States and on the part of Texas did not agree, and no line was formally run or agreed upon.

Mr. LANHAM. And no report was made.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. And no report was ever made. After that there was a contract made between the Secretary of the Interior, I think——

Mr. LANHAM. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Between the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and an engineer or surveyor by the name of Brown to mark the boundary between the Indian Nation and Texas. That commission did run that line, as they supposed correctly, and did locate the spot where they supposed the hundredth degree of longitude crossed the river. But Texas was not bound by that, because its commissioners did not co-operate—in fact, it had no commissioners and was not invited to participate in that survey.

Now, if the gentleman from Maine will permit me, I want to go further and say that I was a member of the Committee on the Judiciary from which the bill was reported to which the gentleman refers, and there was a report accompanying the bill which disputed the title of Texas to this region of territory. I did concur in the bill, but I did not concur in the report at all. I believed then and I believe now that the Senate bill would fix and determine this boundary as well as the bill which is now before the House, for in my estimation there is not a particle of difference between them, not a particle; and if I had time I would like to show it.

Mr. HORR. Does the gentleman mean the Senate bill or the "Willits" bill?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I mean the "Willits" bill. If I can get the time I can show that.

Mr. REED. I will yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. This whole dispute springs from the fact that it is not definitely understood where the hundredth degree of longitude crosses the river that the makers of the treaty had in their minds; that is the truth about it. If we knew what was Red River, as the men who drew the treaty understood or supposed it to be, then there would be no trouble whatever about this boundary.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman is familiar with this whole matter. Let me ask him——

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I have but five minutes.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman can have more time.

Mr. REED. I will yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. HORR. Did the United States Government heretofore once appoint just such a commission as this to act in conjunction with the Texas commission?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. They did, under the act of 1854.

Mr. HORR. Did that commission of the United States go on the ground and meet the commission appointed by Texas?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. They did.

Mr. HORR. That is right, then.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. That is right.

Mr. HORR. I supposed that was so. Now what was the difficulty; why did they not settle this boundary?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. The difficulty was that the commissioners on the part of Texas did not understand their instructions in such a way as to permit them to co-operate with the commissioners on the part of the United States with their construction of their instructions.

Mr. HORR. Why not; what was the difference?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. That would lead me——

Mr. CUTCHEON. We want to avoid that same difficulty now.

Mr. HORR. Did they not in their action proceed to this very point, and then, because the commissioners on the part of the United States insisted upon following Melish's map, did not the Texas commissioners pull up stakes and go home and leave the other commissioners to fix the boundary?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. My understanding is this: That the commissioners on the part of Texas—I believe there were two of them—declined to co-operate with the commissioners on the part of the United States because as they understood from their instructions they were required by General Houston not to concede that the one hundredth degree of longitude crossed the river at any other place except on the North Fork.

Mr. HORR. And when they could not agree the Texas commissioners went home, and the United States commissioners went on and completed the survey and made their report to the Interior Department?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. No, sir; no report was ever made.

Mr. HORR. And is it not the fact that every map ever made since then was made on the line fixed by that very commission? Now, how does this bill avoid that difficulty? When you get to that very point are you to get any report from the Texas commissioners when you reach that difficulty?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I will answer that question. If the gentleman will notice the statute passed by the State of Texas on this subject he will see that it requires the governor to appoint two commissioners to act in conjunction with a like commission on the part of the United States; that they shall go upon the ground to mark out this boundary and ascertain where the one hundredth degree of longitude crosses the Red River in contemplation of the treaty between Spain and the United States—marking out the disputed line. Now, if the governor of Texas should direct his commission not to investigate whether or not the line crossed the South Fork of the Red River, then as a matter of course the commission would come to grief, just as the commission did in 1854.

Mr. HORR. Suppose they get right to the point as they did before?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. They can not get there under this bill.

Mr. HORR. I would like the gentleman to show me why.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I am showing you why; because the law of Texas requires that these commissioners shall mark the boundary and establish the point where the one hundredth degree of longitude crosses the Red River.

Mr. HORR. But suppose the United States surveyors or engineers say that it crosses upon one fork and the surveyors of the State of Texas say that it crosses on the other, what are you going to do?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Both of the bills—the bill spoken of by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the bill now before the House—provide that the commissioners shall make a report of their proceedings to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall report the matter to Congress, and that the action of the commissioners shall have no effect until confirmed by Congress.

Mr. HORR. Then who is to decide the point?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Congress is finally to decide it, as a matter of course.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me, for the information of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], read from the language of the bill:

> Said commission will report their action in the premises, upon the completion thereof, to the Secretary of the Interior, with all necessary notes, maps, and other papers, in order that in determining this part of the boundary between the Indian Territory and the State of Texas it may be definitely settled whether the North Fork or the South Fork (or Prairie-Dog-Town Fork) of said river is the main or true Red River contemplated in said treaty; and the said Secretary of the Interior shall transmit the said report of such commission to Congress, at the next session thereof after such report may be made, for action by Congress.

Mr. HORR. Now, my point is that this bill proposes to ascertain what is the "main or true Red River," while according to the treaty we should ascertain what was the fork laid down on Melish's map.

Mr. REAGAN. Melish's map did not show the two streams at all; the existence of these two streams was only ascertained by subsequent explorations.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to these two bills. Of course I prefer the bill now under consideration. It was prepared by my colleague [Mr. LANHAM]. It is a fair and honest bill; it makes no effort to compromit the rights of the United States in respect to this territory. This bill I think ought to pass; but I do say there is no substantial difference between this bill and that to which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has referred. In the bill of Mr. Willits, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary in the last Congress, we find this language:

> Whereas a controversy exists between the United States and Texas as to the point where the one hundredth degree of longitude crosses the Red River, as described in the treaty; and
> Whereas the point of crossing has never been ascertained and fixed by any authority competent to bind the United States and Texas; and
> Whereas it is desirable that a settlement of this controversy should be had, to the end that the question of boundary, now in dispute because of a difference of opinion as to said crossing, may also be settled.

This bill provides that a commission shall ascertain and mark the point where the one hundredth meridian of longitude crosses the Red River, in accordance with the terms of the treaty. If that be done, this whole question is settled. Whenever Congress fixes the point (and Congress has a right to do it finally) where this one hundredth meridian crosses the Red River, as described by the treaty, then this confusion will be removed. Now, the fact is, the bill before the House does no more than that, because it provides that these commissioners shall decide which one of these forks, as explained by my colleague [Mr. LANHAM], is the Red River as understood and described in the treaty. There can be no difficulty about that, especially when this commission is required to report to Congress, and Congress holds the power to affirm or reject its work.

Mr. KASSON. Before the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] takes his seat I would like to ask him a question. Are there two forks of the Red River laid down in Melish's map?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. No, sir; only one.

Mr. KASSON. Then does not the gentleman see that by the second section of the bill reported from the Committee on Territories we are bringing to the consideration of this commission a new branch of the Red River not in contemplation at the time of the treaty? It seems to me perfectly clear that there are two substantial differences between the two bills. The first is in the constitution of the commission. The bill of the Judiciary Committee proposes a commission of Government engineers, to be detailed on the part of the United States. This bill proposes the appointment of commissioners, in the discretion of the President, "one of whom shall be a practical engineer, or if in the pleasure of the President it is deemed more expedient, to detail one or more competent engineers of the Army." This discretionary power on the part of the President is probably not a vital difference. The first section of this bill does not use the precise language of the treaty, but I think it uses the substantial language.

I regard it as always dangerous to change the language of the treaty in submitting a question to a commission to define a boundary. But the crossing points here are substantially the points given in the treaty.

But then you come with something new between lines 33 and 37 of the bill. Giving the reason why this commission shall report to the Secretary of the Interior, you say, which is entirely surplusage, "in order that in determining this part of the boundary between the Indian Territory and the State of Texas it may be definitely settled whether the North Fork or the South Fork (or Prairie-Dog-Town Fork) of said river is the main or true Red River contemplated in said treaty."

There you submit evidently to their discretion to determine what is the main or true Red River, and then add "as contemplated in said treaty;" but the treaty says nothing about the two forks, nor does the map say anything about two forks. It seems to me that language is there for a purpose, because otherwise it is surplusage. I only know this purpose: you create what Melish's map does not create, two forks, one known as the North Fork and the other as the Prairie-Dog-Town Fork, which is new matter.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Let me submit to the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. KASSON. Let me finish my criticism first, because I have only five minutes.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Let me answer as far as you have gone.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman from Maine does not object.

Mr. REED. I want to allow the fairest opportunity for discussion of this bill, and if necessary I will yield for five minutes longer to the gentleman from Iowa for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Texas to ask his question.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. We are legislating as to facts as we understand them and the geography of the country as we understand it.

Mr. KASSON. That is the answer, I suppose.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. At the time Melish's map was made that was a terra incognita; it had never been explored.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will now allow me to go on. He has made his answer and I desire to respond to that answer. I think we ought and must object, for the reason the gentleman has stated, to the incorporation of new matter, because we are not to interpret the boundary in the light of new additions to geography, but we are to interpret it according to the light of the geography which then existed, and further, as it was actually intended in Melish's map.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. This is not new geography, but old geography.

Mr. KASSON. I did not hear what the gentleman from Texas said.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. At the date of Melish's map no one knew there was another fork to the Red River.

Mr. KASSON. I understand the gentleman, and that is the very point to which we must object, because we can not by new light create new facts and then say the commission shall be guided by the new facts. The language is explicit as laid down in Melish's map of 1818.

I come now to the most substantial objection indicated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], and in order to make it plain I must read this section:

> SEC. 2. That when the main or true Red River is by said commission ascertained, then such landmark as shall plainly indicate and define the same as a corner shall be erected at the point where the one hundredth degree of longitude west from Greenwich crosses Red River.

Now, observe how you have led us along by modification of language until we reach your second section and then you abandon the treaty, you abandon Mellish's map, and you propose to say what now is found to be the true or main Red River, and force them to fix the station or landmark at that point as ascertained.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Allow me one minute. You must read that section of course in connection with the first section.

Mr. KASSON. But allow me to proceed. My criticism rests on the facts as they are here. The first section goes on with the language of the treaty and introduces new elements. I wish further to call the attention of the committee——

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. The gentleman will allow me just there to say——

Mr. KASSON. Please allow me to make my point clear.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I thought you wished me to respond.

Mr. KASSON. No; I thought you were to ask me a question.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I thought you asked me to answer your question.

Mr. KASSON. Now with reference to this second section. This is the important point of the bill, and unless we abandon the rights of the United States and by this bill conclude these rights before a report from the commission is received, this bill can not be accepted by the House. And the reason, I repeat, is—whatever you may think of the first section—that the objection is contained in the second independent section as I have suggested; and it is just this, that it does not undertake to follow the language of the treaty with reference to the true Red River as laid down by Melish's map, but to adopt the line of the river that may now be found by a commission. When this river is ascertained, not with reference to the treaty, then this bill makes it necessary that that point shall be indicated right there, and you conclude the commission by the passage of this bill. I can not find any escape from that position under the language of the second section. I can not, Mr. Chairman, vote for a bill of this character, while I would cheerfully support one which does not conclude the commission in any manner, and leaves it free to find the river and to determine the point at issue as laid down by the treaty and Melish's map.

Mr. STRUBLE. I would like to inquire whether there can be any objection to amending that section?

Mr. REED. Why not pass this other bill, the Willits bill, which is free from such objections?

Mr. KASSON. I think the committee have endeavored, unintentionally perhaps, to conclude the rights of the United States and bind the commission to find what is now the location of the Red River, and not what was recognized as that river under the terms of the treaty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. I will reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine has twenty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of the five minutes allotted to me by the gentleman from South Carolina for the purpose of replying to the only point of objection that has been urged against the passage of this bill by those gentlemen who oppose it. These I regard as the only points which have been presented, and I will answer them in detail. It is urged against the passage of this bill that it describes what later discoveries have developed and which have been made since Melish's map was prepared. It is insisted that we must, in directing the commission, follow that map to reach the point where the one hundredth meridian of longitude crosses the Red River; and it is assumed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] very distinctly, and it was also assumed by others, that any other direction to the commission is objectionable.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, it is a well-established fact that later discoveries and investigations since the time that map was published disclose the fact that there are two branches of the Red River, perhaps unknown at that day, which come together east of the one hundredth meridian of longitude; so that if you cross the Red River as one stream you must go east of the one hundredth meridian of longitude in order to do so. The division of the river occurs inside of the Indian Territory, and consequently this meridian line must pass east of that division, which would leave to Texas a much larger scope of territory than she has any right to or claims. Is the gentleman willing to insist upon that?

Mr. KASSON. What I insist upon is that we must follow the direction of the treaty.

Mr. REAGAN. It would be necessary, as I say, to go inside of the Indian Territory to find this point of crossing. And the gentleman from Iowa objects to this bill because it discloses what later discoveries have brought to our knowledge since that map was made, that there are two rivers, and they are so distinctly two rivers that the authorities of Texas, antecedent to 1864, claimed this territory now in dispute. That State and the United States Government then entered upon measures for the purpose of settling this dispute. The question was not so free of doubt but that the State of Texas claimed jurisdiction over it, and claimed that the North Fork of the Red River was the true line, and subsequently proceeded to survey lands, and returned them to the General Land Office, assuming jurisdiction to treat it as a part of the territory of the State of Texas. At the same time the doubt as to which was the true Red River induced the Interior Department, through its officers, to assume that the South Fork of Red River is the true river as laid down in the treaty.

The gentleman from Iowa seems to make his objections to this bill on the ground that it speaks of facts which the entire Department recognize as facts, which the authorities of Texas know as facts, and which all of this House know that it does deal with as facts. They are controlling facts, which we all know to exist.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman object to Melish's map?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Iowa I understand is a lawyer, and understanding that, I must confess that I was struck with wonder at the position he has taken, that you must follow entirely the description of this river which was known by no living human being when it was made, which was perhaps a matter of tradition only, and if you can not go by that description, then, according to his logic, you can not make a boundary line at all. Now, that description has been shown to be vague, undefined, and erroneous. Had it not been so there could have been no dispute. But according to the theory of the gentleman from Iowa we must adopt a condition of things which will result in creating perpetual confusion there.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

Mr. REAGAN. I should like to have had a little more time myself to have completed my sentence and wish the gentleman had dealt as liberally with me.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I yield ten minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a misapprehension in regard to there being any difference as a matter of fact between the bill reported by Mr. Willits from the Committee on the Judiciary in the Forty-seventh Congress and the one introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] in this Congress, and which is now before the Committee of the Whole for consideration. It is said that they differ in the description of the boundary line between Texas and the Indian Territory. Now, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that that is a mistake. If you will take up the Willits bill you will see at once that the description begins at the mouth of the Sabine River where it enters into the Gulf of Mexico. It follows that river to a point where the thirty-second degree of north latitude crosses it. There can be no mistake about that point. It makes no difference what any map may say or what any gentleman may say. There can be no dispute as to the location of that point, because the boundary line follows the west bank of the river Sabine until it strikes the thirty-second degree of north latitude.

The next description given in the Willits bill says, in defining the next boundary line, that it leaves that point, which is a definite point, and runs due north until it strikes Red River. There can be no doubt about this point, either, because it is also a fixed point. An engineer would have no difficulty in following this line from the point on the Sabine River where the thirty-second degree of north latitude crosses it due north to the point where it would strike the Red River. There can be no dispute about this line. These points and this line are definitely fixed by this description. We need no commission to determine any question thus far. This is a matter of description, which can not be changed. There is no difficulty in ascertaining it. Any engineer can ascertain it without any trouble whatever. Therefore there was no need of having that in this bill.

Now we are at the Red River, at the point where this line running due north from the Sabine River strikes the Red River. The next part of the description is where the difficulty arises. The Willits bill says, and so does this bill, that the next boundary line is found by following the Red River westward—not due west. If it said that the boundary would not be in doubt or in dispute a due west line from that point would be definite and could be easily ascertained by an engineer or surveyor. That would remove all trouble and obviate all difficulty. But that is not what the bill says nor is that what either bill says, for both are alike in this description. That is not the language of the treaty, the first treaty or the second treaty. It is not the language of any bill or any report. The language is, "westward to a point where the line crosses the one hundredth degree of west longitude." There is where the difficulty arises and there is where the dispute comes in, and there is no dispute or difficulty in any other line. And there the two bills are precisely alike.

The only line or boundary in dispute or that ever has been in dispute is the line running from the point where this first-mentioned line strikes the Red River to the point where Red River strikes the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich or 23° west from Washington, and this line can only be determined by following the Red River westward, as is stated in both bills, until you find the point where Red River crosses the one hundredth degree of west longitude. The dispute is between those two points, and only between those two points. And hence in the preparation of this bill the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] has used the same language used in the Willits bill, only he did not go back as far in his description as the Willits bill does, for it begins at the Gulf of Mexico and runs along the west bank of the Sabine River until it reaches the thirty-second degree of north latitude, and then it leaves the Sabine River and runs due north until it strikes the Red River. The present bill begins at the Sabine River at the same point precisely which is reached by the Willits bill, and runs due north over the same line. The Willits bill describes that line, which runs from the mouth of the Sabine River north until it strikes the thirty-second degree of north latitude, which this bill does not describe. This line is omitted in this bill, and here is the difference between the two bills in the description of the boundaries. From the Sabine River they both follow the same line and the same description.

So that as a matter of fact this bill goes further back toward the Gulf of Mexico, if you please, than the dispute goes. There is no dispute as to the boundary line between the Gulf of Mexico and the Red River; none whatever. The river is there and can be followed. The lines are there; their courses are defined and can be run. The bill before this committee only embraces that part which is in dispute, and has been in dispute all these long years. The dispute exists and has existed for a long time, and this bill proposes a plan of settlement, simply pointing out what part of the boundary is in dispute and a plan of adjustment.

But gentlemen say that we are surrendering up the rights of the United States; that we are ceding away this disputed tract of land. Why, sir, that is entirely a mistake. They seem to confound Melish's map with the land out there, with the territory, with the mountains and plains, with the rivers and natural divisions. Mr. Chairman, that can not be. These two rivers are there; they have been there during all the centuries of the past. They are there to-day, and you must take things as they are. Mr. Melish did not know they were there. He made his map on the supposition that there was but one stream there; and on that map he calls that stream the Red River, and the treaty calls it the Red River, and these descriptions call it the Red River. But when we go there to ascertain where the Red River is we find two streams. We find there two rivers instead of one; we find there a north fork and a south fork.

The question is which one is the Red River? That is the question, and the only question. Why is not this bill a fair one? Melish's map is not adapted to the actual situation. When you go there to fix the boundary, when you go there to drive the stakes, when you go there to plant monuments, when you go there to fix the boundary between the Indian Territory and the State of Texas, between Greer County and some other county, you want a locus in quo; you want a place where you can fix corners, plant monuments, and delineate boundaries. This, and this only, we propose to do. Melish's map is a part of the description. It is an indispensable guide in making this survey, in ascertaining what was meant by this description, in showing to the commission to be appointed what was meant by the men who wrote that description. There is to be seen on Melish's map the shape and direction of Red River at that point. Intelligent men, engineers and surveyors, can probably decide by an inspection of the map whether its course and direction at that point correspond better with the North Fork or the South Fork of Red River.

I think therefore there can be no objection whatsoever to this bill so far as the description is concerned. It is an entire misapprehension to suppose that there is any job in this bill or that the State of Texas can gain any advantage from the language employed in it one way or the other. The gentleman from Texas can have no such object; the Representatives from that State certainly have no such object, and I am sure the committee did not intend to give Texas any advantage whatever by the passage of this bill. The dispute exists—let us begin there—the dispute exists; it has existed there for a quarter of a century. It has been before Congress after Congress and committee after committee during all these years, the State of Texas claiming this land and the Indian Territory claiming it. Is it not fair, is it not right, is it not just, that we should appoint a commission, and in this way take the initiatory steps toward settlement? Texas will appoint three commissioners and the United States will appoint three commissioners, and if it is a plain case that this disputed tract of land belongs to the United States, as is claimed here, and in this I concur, it is not likely that this joint commission will decide in favor of Texas. For this reason we ought to be more willing to appoint a commission.

It is not claimed that the commission is to decide this question. The commission will report the facts and give its opinion, and if the facts given do not support its conclusion, Congress can refuse, and no doubt will refuse, to confirm the report. The object of this commission is to investigate the matter and report the facts.

Mr. Chairman, this is no new thing. Gentlemen will find by reference to page 158 of fourth United States Statutes at Large that in 1826 a commission was appointed almost precisely like this to determine a disputed boundary line between the Territory of Florida and the State of Georgia; and two years later, in 1828, another law was passed appointing a commission for the purpose of fixing the boundary between the State of Louisiana and the Territory of Arkansas. We have these and other precedents for this very thing; and if it was found to be a good thing in those and other cases, we do not see why it will not be a good thing in this.

There is a necessity for this action. This territory is in the county of Greer, and the courts of Texas have assumed jurisdiction over the inhabitants. I am informed that there is to-day in the penitentiary of the State of Texas a man who was tried and convicted of murder within this disputed territory; he is now suffering his sentence in the penitentiary of Texas. If it be true that this disputed territory does not belong to Texas, but does belong to the Indian Territory, the judge of the court of Texas before whom this prisoner was tried had no jurisdiction over either the person of the criminal or the territory where the crime was committed.

Mr. REED. Will this bill give that judge jurisdiction?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. This bill will after a while determine the question of boundary, I hope. It is a step in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I will ask for three minutes more.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I have promised to give away the remainder of my time.

Mr. REED. I will give the gentleman three minutes out of my time, inasmuch as I asked him a question which I hope he will answer.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I will answer the gentleman's question. My judgment is that this disputed territory belongs to the Indian Territory. That is the judgment of the United States authorities, and that is the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, and I think any competent commission will so decide; and when a decision is reached we will know definitely who has and who has not jurisdiction. But we are not here affirming the one thing or the other. The Representatives from Texas are not here affirming the one thing or the other. All they ask is that this question shall be settled one way or the other. Greer County wants to organize as a county, and she ought to do so. The people in that county are all in a state of suspense. They do not know under what authority they are living. When they are called upon to pay taxes in that county they reply, "No; we belong to the Indian Territory."

Mr. REED. And they are right about that.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Men who have their flocks and their herds there, who have cattle by the thousand and tens of thousands, do not want to belong to Texas, because in Texas they make people pay taxes; and these people want to belong to the Indian Territory, where people do not pay taxes.

There is a constant dispute about the matter. When the sheriff goes over there to arrest a man the man says that he will not be arrested. The sheriff calls a posse comitatus and the cattle-men gather around in a crowd, and there is a conflict. Sometimes it comes near to bloodshed. This difficulty has existed for years and years. The State of Texas insists, and has insisted always, that this territory belongs to it, and hence it embraces this disputed territory in its map of the State and calls it Greer County. It has attached it to a certain judicial district and attempts to enforce its laws upon the inhabitants of this county. It attempts to collect taxes and enforce obedience. The United States has always denied that Texas has anything to do with this tract of country. The people ought to know to what authority they owe allegiance. The men who live there ought to know whether they live in Texas or in Indian Territory, to whom to pay taxes, to what laws they are amenable.

There was a commission appointed by Congress for this same purpose in 1858, but it failed for some reason to act. At the last session of Congress, and at this also, a bill almost the same as this passed the Senate. In 1882 the Texas Legislature passed a law authorizing the appointment of a commission to act in connection with a commission to be thereafter appointed by the United States. The President has favorably recommended the appointment of this commission. When this bill was before the Committee on Territories I called on the Secretary of the Interior and inquired of him whether there was any objection to this bill, and he said he saw none. He said most emphatically that the disputed territory belonged to the United States, but thought a commission would lead to a speedy settlement of the difficulty.

Gentlemen can see very well how naturally difficulties will arise on this disputed territory. One class of men claim that this territory belongs to Texas, another class claim that it belongs to the Indian Territory, and there is a conflict. The people are in doubt, the question is in dispute, and the Government stands aside unwilling to take any forward step for the purpose of settling this difficulty, which is a matter of great consequence to the State of Texas and to this Government, but of still greater consequence to the helpless people who live in this territory now in dispute.

The only objection I have ever seen to this bill, the only doubt I have entertained in any way in regard to it, is as to whether this commission would settle the dispute or not. I have feared that perhaps the members of the commission appointed by the governor of Texas would decide in favor of Texas, and that the members of the commission appointed by the President of the United States would decide in favor of the Government, and simply agree to disagree, and like the old commission fail to reach a conclusion. This seems to me to be the most objectionable feature of this bill, and yet this objection has not been made by any one opposing the bill.

Still they may come to a conclusion. As other commissions of this kind have heretofore been appointed and have been successful, so the commission in this case may succeed in coming to an agreement. As a matter of justice to the State of Texas, and as a matter of interest to the country at large, I think we should appoint this commission. It is conclusive of nothing. We do not surrender up any title whatever by the appointment of this commission. We simply take a step in the right direction.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Why not strike out the second section of the bill?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I care nothing about the second section. I do not think it a matter of any great consequence.

Mr. REED. The right way is to strike out the whole thing.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman explain why the Willits bill will not meet his views as well as this one?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I did not see the Willits bill until it was produced here since the opening of this discussion, and have not compared it with this one sufficiently to determine the comparative merits of the two bills. I think either would accomplish the purpose intended. I only insist that the objections to this bill are not well taken. The whole matter will come back to Congress, and must abide the final action of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. So anxious am I, Mr. Chairman, that we should get through this bill and give an opportunity to our friends from the Territories to have disposed of to-day some legislation which is very important to them, that I will forego any remarks which I had proposed to make.

I want to say simply two or three words. The first thing to be ascertained is whether there has been a controversy. There has been a controversy ever since 1857 in regard to this land. In 1852 a survey of this boundary was made by two United States officers of the Engineer Corps, General McClellan and Mr. Marcy. By a mistake they located this meridian line one whole degree farther east than the true crossing of that line. In other words, they fixed the meridian line below the forks of this stream. Texas was perfectly satisfied with that. There was no controversy about it for years, until 1857, as remarked by my friend from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], a survey was made by contract between the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and two men named Brown and Jones, I believe. It was an astrometrical survey, which fixed the true meridian line. From that time to this there has been a controversy as to whether the United States Government or the State of Texas ought to have jurisdiction over this territory.

In 1879, as my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] has remarked, by some careless legislation this county of Greer was included in the judicial act as a part of the northern district of Texas.

Now, here are plenty of reasons for raising an issue. This issue is not a new one. You have already been told that a commission was appointed before, from which nothing came. It never made a report; and even the field notes made by it are not now accessible.

I say, therefore, there is a necessity for having this matter settled; and all this controversy about the mode of doing it amounts simply to this: whether we shall adopt the measure reported to a Republican House in the last Congress by the Committee on the Judiciary, or whether we shall adopt the measure reported to this House by the Committee on the Territories. So far as the facts are to be ascertained, there is absolutely no difference in the methods, except that by the bill proposed by the Committee on the Territories the United States Government and the State of Texas are brought face to face in this controversy, are to settle this question by joint commission—a commission appointed by the State of Texas, to be paid for under the act of its Legislature, and a commission on the part of the United States. But this commission is to take no final action. The whole matter will come back to Congress to be settled by us after we receive the report.

It does seem to me that all this controversy about methods is unnecessary; and I trust that the House will proceed to dispose of this measure in a very few minutes. I yield five minutes to my friend from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, in the limited time allowed me I can say but little upon this subject. The controversy between the United States and Texas in reference to the true boundary between that State and the Indian Territory is of comparatively recent origin; for until the boundary was interfered with by unauthorized persons so far as Texas was concerned there was no dispute whatever as to where the limits of the State extended. In 1851 or 1852, probably, officers of the United States Army, Captain McClellan being one of them, placed the intersection of the one hundredth meridian of west longitude with the Red River below the forks of that stream. That would take in a very considerable portion of territory that is now conceded by Texas to belong rightfully to the Indian Territory. But, as I have said, by some action unauthorized so far as Texas was concerned parties were sent down in the interest of the Indian Territory and a survey made, I believe, by Mr. Jones and Mr. Brown, in which they established the one hundredth meridian of west longitude a degree farther west than it had been previously established by the officers of the United States Army.

From that time on controversy has existed as to where the true boundary is. This controversy must be determined by ascertaining, if possible, what stream is referred to in the treaty of 1819 between Spain and the United States, which was kept up subsequently between Mexico and the United States and afterward recognized in the articles of annexation as between the then becoming State of Texas and the United States.

It is a little singular that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], though appealed to several times to point out the difference between this bill and the measure which he seems so anxious to have substituted for it, has not answered any question propounded to him on that subject—reserving his answer, I suppose, until he shall come to conclude the remarks he may have to submit. In the estimate of that gentleman there is a very marked difference, at least in point of law if not in point of fact; and the gentleman who last spoke says there is no substantial difference in point of fact. Now, comparing the bill which the gentleman from Maine favors with that now before the committee, there will be found in the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Maine this significant omission—it does not provide in the terms of the bill before the committee that the boundary shall be determined, as it ought to be, according to Melish's map. The gentleman said, I believe—though I do not know that he would repeat it now—that this reference to the map being embraced in the preamble it is not necessary to retain it in the body of the bill itself. Most persons would readily recognize in him too learned and able a lawyer to maintain seriously the proposition that the body of the bill will be controlled by the preamble.

Mr. REED. The bill says where the one hundredth meridian crosses the Red River, in accordance with the terms of the treaty.

Mr. HANCOCK. Of course. What does he wish to insist on by his substitute if he means simply to accomplish the same thing as the bill now pending before the committee, the whole to be laid down according to Melish's map or the whole to be in accordance with the language of the treaty itself? Now, is it not likely—and I will not accuse the gentleman of any such purpose—that it may be said there is such a great controversy over this point that it is dishonestly intended to confine the commission to the treaty and not include the map.

Mr. REED. But the map is in the treaty.

Mr. HANCOCK. Then there is nothing between you if the map is in the treaty. Is the map in the treaty?

Mr. REED. Most assuredly.

Mr. HANCOCK. Then why not put it in your bill?

Mr. REED. I have got it in my bill.

Mr. HANCOCK. No; you have it in your preamble, but not in your bill.

Mr. REED. I will add a section that the preamble shall be considered a part of the bill.

Mr. HANCOCK. We prefer it as it is here. There is no chance for jobbery in this bill. We only want a fair settlement of this according to the facts as shown by the treaty and by Melish's map. But the complaint of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is that no new facts should be taken notice of. I will only say that the crucial test between the respective parties is as to the Red River contemplated in this treaty and as shown by Melish's map. It is not proposed these co-operating committees shall determine that point as to the rights of the contestants to this disputed territory, but that they shall collect all the facts, make a survey, and report to Congress, when the expectation is that at least a majority of the two Houses will be disposed to do what is right and just as between these contestants.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Whatever time I have remaining I wish to reserve.

Mr. REED. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Sixteen minutes.

Mr. REED. I thought I had seventeen; I do not want to lose the other minute. I will yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, all I desire to say about this bill was said in the question I put to the gentleman from Maine, nor would I add another word but for the remark made by the gentleman from South Carolina, that this was simply offering to substitute a Republican bill for a Democratic bill. I make no such efforts, and I repudiate the idea that any party politics should enter into questions which the committee says simply is honestly to ascertain where the boundary line is between United States property and property of Texas.

This question was submitted to the Judiciary Committee of the last Congress. An able Representative from Texas was on that committee. We examined the matter thoroughly and we came to the conclusion that the form of the Willits bill was right.

It differs from this bill in most essential points. It says the boundary shall be according to the treaty, which treaty is based on a particular map. There is no uncertainty about it of any kind. This bill in its second section says the boundary shall be wherever you shall ascertain the true Red River to be, without any regard to Melish's map. That map has been in existence in its improved condition since 1818. It can be ascertained very easily where the river that Melish laid down on the map is, and in naming any other fork of the river as the true river is to transfer the lands of the United States to Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. May I submit to the gentleman from Georgia one fact?

Mr. HAMMOND. I have not time. The time I am speaking in is another man's.

I want simply to say this: the committee can not wish that the State of Texas shall have that which is not hers according to the treaty, nor can it wish that Texas shall not have that which is hers according to the treaty. Let us meet on the common ground of the language of the treaty and enforce it. No man has a right to ask any more. I will vote for no more, and because the Willits bill does stand on the words of the treaty and this bill ignores part of the words of the treaty, I shall vote for the Willits bill and against this one.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Georgia has so well presented this question it seems hardly necessary to do anything more. I did not notice the observation of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS], by which he undertook to make some sort of political question of this. I wish to assure the House, if it needs any assurance, that I have not the slightest party, State, or national feeling in regard to this matter; but I have investigated the subject, and believe sincerely that Greer County belongs to the United States so clearly that nothing but misaction on our part here can throw any cloud over the title.

I believe the people interested back of the Representatives from Texas have framed a bill which in its effect—for I question no man's motives and I ascribe no purposes to any man—but which in its effect will throw a cloud over the title of the United States which may cause some hesitating and doubtful report to be sent to a Congress not yet elected and of which we know nothing, which may end in our losing this immense territory. Texas does not come here as a suppliant for anything and rightfully. We spent $10,000,000 in rectifying the western boundary of Texas years ago, and it is now proposed to risk a territory as large as the State of Rhode Island to rectify another corner. I submit that it is neither wise nor just to the people of this country for us to throw any cloud over our own title. Let us give everybody a fair chance. Let us put this thing before the commission in proper language, and then we shall be in a condition to abide by the result. But I warn the House that if this bill in its present form is passed, the bill which is now presented by this committee, so insidious in its language and full of such doubtful expressions, you will find yourselves very fairly on the road to surrendering the territory which belongs to the people of the United States instead of protecting it.

Now I offer as a substitute for the bill presented by the committee the joint resolution which I have already read to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the bill is not as yet reported for consideration by sections and amendment.

Mr. REED. I will reserve it, then, until the proper time.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I ask that general debate be now closed, and that the bill be read by sections for amendment. I will simply make one remark before that motion is submitted to the House.

I can not, Mr. Chairman, for the life of me, see where the pitfalls are in this bill, as the great danger which menaces the interests of the people of this country or which threatens any of their rights if we pass it. The language of the treaty is quoted.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from South Carolina permit me to point out one pitfall?

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. The language of the treaty is:

The whole, being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States.

Now, the second section of this bill proposes a commission which shall decide which is the true Red River, not according to the treaty, but with power to fix any other point.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I do not see where the objection comes in.

Mr. REED. Now, that question has nothing to do with the subject. It is Melish's Red River which we must follow, in the language of the treaty, I do not care whether it existed or not.

Mr. REAGAN. Was Melish's Red River the true Red River?

Mr. REED. I am sure I do not know.

Mr. REAGAN. Then let us ascertain that fact.

Mr. REED. I do not know which is the true Red River nor do you.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, every one who reads the bill will see that it is based upon the treaty. There is only one fact to be ascertained. This commission is appointed to investigate it; it goes down, finds out the facts, and reports to Congress its final action.

I now ask that the bill be read for debate and amendment by sections.

The Clerk read the first section of the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint a commission of three persons, who shall be well versed in the laws governing boundary lines, and one of whom shall be a practical engineer, or if, in the pleasure of the President, it is deemed more expedient to detail one or more competent engineers of the Army who, in conjunction with such person or persons as may be appointed by the State of Texas, shall, at such time in the near future as may be indicated by the President, official notice of which time shall be given by him to the governor of Texas at least one month in advance of the actual service of such commission, run and mark the boundary line between said portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas now in controversy; and said commission shall, as far as possible, ascertain and determine the Red River indicated and intended by the treaty between the United States and Spain of date February 22, 1819. In running and marking said boundary line the said commission shall proceed as follows: Beginning at the point where a line drawn from the point where the thirty-second degree of north latitude crosses the western bank of the Sabine River, crossing Red River, and thence following the course of said Red River westwardly to the degree of longitude 100 west from London and 23° west from Washington, as laid down in Melish's map of the United States published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818. Said commission will report their action in the premises, upon the completion thereof, to the Secretary of the Interior, with all necessary notes, maps, and other papers, in order that in determining this part of the boundary between the Indian Territory and the State of Texas it may be definitely settled whether the North Fork or the South Fork (or Prairie-Dog-Town Fork) of said river is the main or true Red River contemplated in said treaty; and the said Secretary of the Interior shall transmit the said report of such commission to Congress at the next session thereof after such report may be made, for action by Congress.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. There are certain amendments recommended by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 15 strike out the word "said" and insert the word "that;" so that it will read:

"The line between that portion of the Indian Territory," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment recommended by the committee was, in line 24, to strike out the word "crossing" and insert the words "running due north strikes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I now desire to offer the following as a substitute for the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the treaty between the United States and Spain, executed February 22, 1819, fixed the boundary line between the two countries west of the Mississippi River as follows: Beginning on the Gulf of Mexico at the mouth of the Sabine River, in the sea, and continuing north along the western bank of that river to the thirty-second degree of latitude; thence by a line due north to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Nachitoches or Red River; thence following the course of the Rio Roxo westward to the one hundredth degree of longitude west from London and the twenty-third from Washington; thence crossing the said Red River and running thence by a line due north to the river Arkansas; thence following the course of the southern bank of the Arkansas to its source, in latitude 42° north; and thence by that parallel of latitude to the South Sea; the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818; and

Whereas a controversy exists between the United States and Texas as to the point where the one hundredth degree of longitude crosses the Red River, as described in the treaty; and

Whereas the point of crossing has never been ascertained and fixed by any authority competent to bind the United States and Texas; and

Whereas it is desirable that a settlement of this controversy should be had, to the end that the question of boundary, now in dispute because of a difference of opinion as to said crossing, may also be settled: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to detail one or more officers of the Army, who, in conjunction with such person or persons as may be appointed by the State of Texas, shall ascertain and mark the point where the one hundredth meridan of longitude crosses Red River, in accordance with the terms of the treaty aforesaid; and the person or persons appointed by virtue of this act shall make report of his or their action in the premises to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall transmit the same to Congress at the next session thereof after such report may be made, for action by Congress.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the War Department, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of the United States in carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to strike out the last word.

We have had certainly an exalted spectacle here in the speech made by the gentleman from Maine. He does not live within 3,000 miles of an Indian. You have nothing to do with the measurement practically of the boundary lines of Texas and the Indian Territory; and yet living in a bow of the New England States you have displayed the most magnificent zeal on a question in which you can have no personal interest. [Laughter.]

That is all there is of it.

You manage your eastern section of the country and we will try to manage ours. [Renewed laughter.] Maine is not big enough to control the vast scope of country lying west of the Alleghany Mountains, and you have brains enough to comprehend that. [Laughter.]

What is this bill, Mr. Chairman? It is simply a bill, as I understand it, to appoint commissioners to ascertain whether a certain boundary shall be established or not. What has the State of Maine—the little Pine-tree State on the Atlantic coast—to do with the great progress of the West? I would like the gentleman from Maine to tell me why he exhibits such inordinate zeal in a case of this character, in which he can not in the nature of things have any personal interest?

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. BELFORD. I will yield the gentleman from Maine two minutes.

Mr. REED. I thought the gentleman had finished. If he has not got through I do not want to intrude upon him. What he is saying is very interesting.

Mr. BELFORD. I say it is an extraordinary thing that when any Western measure comes up this Eastern gentleman on this side of the House makes war upon it.

I appeal, as I have done heretofore, to you men from the South to stand with us men from the West, and we will put you men of the East down. [Laughter.] That is my idea, Mr. Chairman, of fighting a political battle. The interests of the South and the interests of the West are identical. And I hope to Heaven that you men from the South who have got the control of this body will stand up and protect and vindicate your own interests against the insolent arrogance of the East. If you do not, this country ought to repudiate you, as it has done in the years that are past. But if you will stand up with the people of the West, who are broad and generous and big-hearted, we will carry this country, and we will tell New York and New England that they shall obey our bidding instead of us obeying theirs. [Applause.]

Mr. STRUBLE, and Mr. EVINS of South Carolina, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STRUBLE. Would it be in order for me at this time to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order to offer an amendment to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]. The gentleman from Maine has offered a substitute for the bill as amended, and that substitute is now before the committee.

Mr. STRUBLE. If I remember the language of the bill offered as a substitute, it is much the same as the language of this section to which I desire to have the amendment apply. I would like to offer the amendment anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that an amendment to the first section of the bill as reported by the committee is not now in order. The bill has been read by sections, and a substitute for the bill as amended has been offered by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. STRUBLE. Then I would like to move to amend the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is corrected by the Clerk, who states that only one section of the bill as reported by the Committee on the Territories has as yet been read. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa would be in order.

Mr. STRUBLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10 of the first section, after the word "Texas," insert the following: "Not exceeding three in number;" so that it will read:

"To detail one or more competent engineers of the Army, who, in conjunction with such person or persons as may be appointed by the State of Texas, not to exceed three in number, shall," &c.

Mr. LANHAM. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. STRUBLE. Very good. I have nothing to say if the amendment is accepted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the first section is now under consideration. I move to amend by striking out from the words "shall be," in the sixth line, to the word "Army," in the ninth line, and insert the following: "A competent engineer of the Engineer Corps of the Army."

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I make the point of order that the first section of the bill has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is mistaken. The first section is now under consideration; the second section has not yet been reported.

Mr. REED. I understood, if the Chair pleases, that all the sections were read.

The CHAIRMAN. Such was the impression of the Chair until corrected by the Clerk, who informs him that only the first section was read.

Mr. REED. Then my substitute is not yet in order, as it is a substitute for the whole bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's substitute is in and will be considered as pending at the proper time. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] offers an amendment to the first section, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the words "shall be," in the sixth line, to the word "Army," in the ninth line, and insert in lieu thereof "a competent engineer of the Engineer Corps of the Army;" so that it will read:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint a commission of three persons, who shall be well versed in the laws governing boundary lines, and one of whom shall be a competent engineer of the Engineer Corps of the Army," &c.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only wish to say it has been the usual practice for many years where a service of this kind was to be performed that one of the officers belonging to the Engineer Corps of the Army should be detailed for the purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That when the main or true Red River is by said commission ascertained, then such landmark as shall plainly indicate and define the same as a corner shall be erected at the point where the one hundredth degree of longitude west from Greenwich crosses the Red River.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "Red River," in the first line of section 2, insert the words "as shown by Melish's map aforesaid."

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I presume there will be no objection to that?

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. None at all.

Mr. HAMMOND. I object to that amendment. The language then would be this:

That when the main or true Red River, as shown by Melish's map aforesaid, is by said commission ascertained, then such landmark as shall plainly indicate and define the same, &c.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I wish to modify my amendment by striking out the three words "main or true."

Mr. HAMMOND. Let me make this further suggestion. I have written an amendment which I think will meet the gentleman's views. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 1 of section 2, the words "the main or true Red River" and insert in lieu thereof "the point where the Red River, as laid down by Melish's map, crosses said one hundredth meridian;" and strike out of line 4 the word "the" and insert "that," and all of the words of lines 4 and 5 following the word "point;" so that it will read:

"That when the point where the Red River, as laid down by Melish's map, crosses said one hundredth meridian is by said commission ascertained, then such landmark as shall plainly indicate and define the same as a corner shall be erected at that point."

Mr. HAMMOND. That puts it right.

Mr. REED. Not all of it.

Mr. HAMMOND. That part of it.

The amendment of Mr. HAMMOND was then agreed to.

The Clerk read section 3 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the sum of —— dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided, That the same shall be applied only to the commission appointed by the United States.

The first amendment reported from the Committee on Territories was to fill the blank with the words "ten thousand;" so that it will read "the sum of $10,000," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Territories was, to insert, after the words "provisions of this act," the words "the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "Treasury" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Interior;" so that it will read: "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior." The money is to be appropriated out of the Treasury, but the survey is to be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and the expenditure should be under the direction of the same Department.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the bill by sections for amendment has been concluded.

Mr. REED. I now offer as a substitute for the bill as amended that which I indicated some time since. I do not think it is necessary that it be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless it be demanded, the substitute of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], which has already been reported, will not be read again.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will be read again.

Mr. REED. I should be very glad to have it read if any member desires it, for I think it very important.

The substitute was again read.

Mr. REED. I desire to again point out to the House the difference between these two propositions. The one is a very simple and plain one, so plain that when it is reported upon it can confuse no one. It is a proposition for a commission to ascertain the point where the one hundredth meridian of longitude crosses the Red River under the treaty. When that shall be determined the whole question will be determined and everybody will be able to see it plainly and clearly.

The bill for which I have offered this substitute gives a right to the commission to be appointed to interpret the treaty, instead of leaving it to Congress to make the interpretation. It will enable the commission to report all their action and all the testimony which may be poured in upon them, and there will be only one party interested in pouring testimony upon them, and the result will be that when the report is made there will be a chance to claim before Congress that this territory should go to the State of Texas. Now, if the only fact which is of any importance shall be reported alone, the only fact that can control, then there can not be two opinions on either side of this House. I hope the substitute will be adopted, in order that a fair opportunity may be given for the decision of this question.

Mr. LANHAM. The objection to the substitute of the gentleman from Maine is that if it is adopted and the commission goes there as instructed by the substitute there will be no occasion to make a survey of the two rivers; there will be no facts reported to this or any subsequent Congress upon which we can act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the substitute which has been read.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 66, noes 78.

So (no further count being called for) the substitute was not adopted.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House as amended with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. REAGAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1565) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary line between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with a recommendation that the amendments be concurred in and the bill as amended passed.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I now call the previous question on the amendments and on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that under parliamentary law the bill is entitled to be read again at this stage; and inasmuch as it has been amended in several particulars, which amendments I fear have not been understood by the House, I will ask that it now be read as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire the whole bill read?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do, so that the amendments which have been made may be understood. I do not understand all of them myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. And at this stage I believe it is proper to call for the reading of the entire bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman demands it, the bill will be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Is this reading of the bill by consent or as a matter of right?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that it is called for as a matter of right.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. At this stage of the proceedings?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Clause 2 of Rule XXI makes it a matter of right to have the bill read in full on its passage if demanded by any member.

The bill was read as amended.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the passage of the bill, upon which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] demands the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 51 in the affirmative.

So (more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 67, not voting 116; as follows:

YEAS—139.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I ask to take up House bill No. 4705, in relation to courts and judicial proceedings in the Territories.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that under the provisions of the resolution adopted by the House yesterday the next bill in numerical order reported from the Committee on the Territories is expressly excluded from consideration to-day, and the bill indicated by the gentleman from South Carolina is the one next in order under the resolution.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the supreme court of every Territory shall consist of a chief-justice and three associate justices, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum; and they shall hold their offices for four years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified. They shall hold a term annually at the seat of government of the Territory for which they are respectively appointed: Provided, however, That no justice shall act as a member of the supreme court in any action or proceeding brought to such court by writ of error, bill of exceptions, or appeal from a decision, judgment, or decree rendered by him as judge of a district court.

SEC. 2. That every Territory shall be divided into four judicial districts, and a district court shall be held in each district of the Territory by one of the justices of the supreme court at such time and place as may be prescribed by law; and each judge, after assignment, shall reside in the district to which he is assigned.

SEC. 3. That temporarily, and until otherwise provided by law, the governor of each Territory not now divided into four judicial districts shall, by proclamation, define the judicial districts for such Territory, assign the judges thereto, and fix times and places for holding courts therein: Provided, That no process, proceeding, order, judgment, or decree of any court of any Territory issued, had, made, or rendered prior to the taking effect of such executive order shall be invalidated or affected by the provisions hereof.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the bills (H. R. 1720 and 2942) relating to the judicial proceedings in the Territories, respectfully report the accompanying bill as a substitute for both of said bills, and recommend its passage.

The Attorney-General, in his annual report for 1883, submits the following:

"Under the provision of existing laws there are appointed in each of the Territories (except Dakota) one chief-justice and two associate justices. Much complaint is made by the bar and citizens having business before Territorial courts that the same judge who presides at the trials in the district courts also sits in the supreme court when his decisions are reviewed. The justice of these complaints is so apparent that comment is unnecessary. The matter is therefore submitted for your consideration. Since it is essential that the supreme court of each Territory should be composed of an uneven number of judges, the public interest requires that a fourth judge should be appointed in each of the Territories if the judge sitting below is not to sit in review of his cases. Moreover, the business in each of the Territories is sufficient to justify the appointment of another judge, making four instead of three. There is, therefore, no reason why Congress should not grant the citizens of the several Territories the relief they ask for in this respect."

And it would appear that his recommendation is founded in justice.

The Legislature of Washington Territory has memorialized Congress upon the question, and present their reasons as follows:

"MEMORIAL PRAYING FOR AN ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR THE TERRITORY OF WASHINGTON.

"To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"The memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington respectfully represents:

"That its area of about 70,000 square miles and population of 150,000 constitute thirty-three counties. Of these counties three judicial districts have been formed, in each of which some twenty terms of court per year are held at the respective county seats by one of the judges of the supreme court of the Territory assigned thereto, necessitating extended time for travel to and from, irksome to the judge and very expensive. That to enable the judges to attend all the terms appointed by law the terms are necessarily of short duration, and business of importance can not receive proper consideration. The judges are greatly overworked; their salaries are inadequate for the labor. The Territory pays their extra travel, but the people are very far from being afforded necessary courts. In all the counties remote from those in which the judges severally reside the people are practically without a judiciary except at term time. That the three judges assigned to said districts constitute the supreme court to hear appeals and correct errors. 'We hold this truth to be self-evident,' no judge should be subjected to the delicate duty of trying whether his own decision should be reversed. If he be of that conscientious mold of which judges should be made, he has decided as pertained to law and right, nor should he be expected to abandon an honest conviction or admit errors. A court of last resort so constituted must of necessity afford rather the means for delay than prove a court of appeal for the reversal of error. To secure an appellate tribunal of three, neither of whom has prejudged the case, we ask for four judges, with a prohibition of the third judge who tried the case in the district court from participating in the hearing on appeal or writ of error in such cause."

The evils complained of in Washington are common in the other Territories.

Wyoming, the youngest of the Territories and with the least population, has a property valuation (largely personal) of $80,000,000. Johnson County, in said Territory, organized less than three years, has within its borders personal property of the value of about $8,000,000. This county, with this large amount of property, has had two terms of court of one week each in the last two years. The county seat of the county is two hundred and fifty miles from the place of residence of the judge of that district, and the only means of transportation is by stage or private conveyance.

It is quite evident that where there is so large property interests one week of court a year is wholly inadequate for the proper administration of the civil and criminal laws and the proper protection of life and property. Yet this was all the time that could be given for a term in that county because of the requirements of other counties. New counties are about being formed by the Legislature of that Territory now in session, and new places for holding courts will become a necessity. These can not well be provided for without an additional judge.

This being the condition of affairs in Wyoming, is it not very evident that the older and more populous Territories are in much greater need of this legislation?

The Territory of Dakota has at this time four judges, and a bill has been introduced into this Congress to increase the number to six. It is claimed by reliable gentlemen from that Territory that six judges will be barely able to transact the judicial business thereof.

The increase in the Territories of population and wealth is rapid; that their facilities for the proper administration of their laws should be increased in proportion to their growth and enlarged business interest and wealth seems to be self-evident.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, in earlier days of the Republic, when the Territorial system was first organized and the new Territories consisted mainly of a comparatively small number of hunters, trappers, and pioneers, the present system of Territorial governments was organized. It did well enough perhaps in those days. The quota required for a member of Congress was only 30,000, and that requirement advanced comparatively slowly for years. Now there is a growing disposition against the admission of new States. The Territories are large and populous, and contain great property interests. Some of them have more people and several have more taxable property than the greatest of the Colonies at the time of the Revolution. There are Territories to-day the value of whose productions and commerce is quite as great as that of the whole thirteen Colonies when they threw off the British yoke. And yet under the jealousy of the great States, who are unwilling to let two Senators from one of these new States come in to equal their own representation in the other body of this Congress, it is quite evident that no new State will be admitted by this Congress; and unless the rules of this House are so changed that a majority can overrule a minority on these questions it is not likely that any new State will be admitted for many years. It is not likely that the rules of the House will be changed, and until some party gets a two-thirds majority in the House, which is not now probable, no bill admitting a State can be passed by either party except by compromise.

These considerations make the duty of the House all the more obligatory to remedy any defects in the present Territorial system and to so modify that system as to relieve as much as possible the grievances of the orderly, industrious, and enterprising people of these younger sisters of the great Union of States.

That system is a bad one in many respects. The people are subjected to the government of strangers appointed by the Federal Government without their consent or concurrence, and very often in the face of the direct protest of the people of these Territories. Already this House has taken such notice of this abuse that its Committee on Territories has reported a bill providing that no one shall be appointed governor of one of these Territories who has not been a resident thereof for at least two years. My only objection to that bill is that it does not apply the same principle to all offices and all appointments. Indeed, I favor a bill that will permit all officers to be elected.

While all parts of the Territorial system are objectionable, there is no part of it that has been so hateful as the judicial part of it. It seems to be a prevalent opinion even among intelligent members of this House that the causes to be tried before Territorial courts are unimportant, and that any one who has the name of lawyer is quite competent to try them. The appointing power has generally acted upon the same theory; and the men who have been appointed as our judges have only too often either been broken-down politicians or men without capacity or integrity. There are many exceptions to this, Mr. Chairman, but only enough in my opinion to prove the general correctness of the rule. The judges when appointed have no independence. They are subject to removal by political influence, and threats of this sort of pressure is often brought against them to determine their judgment in causes before them. When their terms expire they are reappointed or removed by the same sort of political influence that procured the original appointments.

Mr. Chairman, outside of great railroad cases, which we also now have in the Territories, there are few cases which come up in your State courts which involve as much money or as great interests as many cases that come before these Territorial courts—cases involving great mines, great landed and other interests, requiring the finest ability and the firmest integrity. One of the greatest causes of complaint has been that the judge who tries the case in the first instance sits on the court of appeal to influence and arrange with his colleagues, so that the decisions of the supreme court are sometimes said to be a mere list of compromises between the judges. However this may be, it will be apparent that the provisions of the pending bill will work an improvement in this respect. It will not give us an ideal system, but it is the best that we can hope or expect.

This bill, which was introduced by the Delegate from Wyoming with the general approval and concurrence of all the Delegates, is about the same as one I introduced in the last Congress. A similar bill, which I introduced for my own Territory, was favorably reported from the Committee on Territories and passed by this House in the Forty-sixth Congress.

The reasons which I urged in favor of the passage of that bill at that time apply with redoubled force now that the Territory has almost doubled in population and business. I shall ask the Clerk to read part of the report of the committee made at that time by a man whose integrity and economy commanded the undivided confidence of this House, Hon. Gabriel Bouck, of Wisconsin. I know, sir, that it has been held by very competent men, such as Senators EDMUNDS and GARLAND, that the volume of business which we have presented as an argument in support of our bill ought to be easily handled by three able and competent judges. That might be so, Mr. Chairman, if our courts sat in one place only or if the means of transportation between distant points and county seats was better. But when you consider these vast distances and the slow and uncertain means of transportation you will see that prompt transaction of our business requires another judge. In my own Territory the civil cases are far behind, and, at least in one instance, I have known a man charged with crime to languish in prison for twenty-two months before we could get a court to try him. The mere statement of this fact ought to convince the House of the necessity for the passage of this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Territory of Montana is about six hundred miles long and three hundred miles wide.

The western or mountainous portion, first filled with a mining and agricultural population, is divided into three judicial districts, all very large, and having such an amount of business before the courts as can scarcely be disposed of.

The eastern counties of the Territory, more recently organized and now being more rapidly settled than any other portion, have no judicial facilities, but have been temporarily attached to the older districts.

It was at one time contemplated to create a new Territory out of this portion of Montana and the western part of Dakota, but it was deemed more economical to give an additional judge to Western Dakota, which has been done, and one to Eastern Montana, which this bill proposes.

This would maintain order and administer justice quite as well and save the expense of a new Territorial government.

Miles City, the county seat of Custer and the nearest county town in the eastern counties, is four hundred and thirty-three miles distant from Virginia City, the only point in the judicial district to which these counties are temporarily attached where a United States court can be held.

The fees and mileage of marshals, witnesses, and jurors over this great distance amounts to a very large sum; so much so, that it is clear that to establish a court for these eastern counties is not only a matter of necessity, but of economy.

Glendive, the county seat of Dawson county, is still farther away from the seat of the United States court.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And now, Mr. Speaker, after this statement, which applies to the other Territories as well as my own, I move that the bill be laid aside by this Committee of the Whole to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. STRUBLE. There is only one objection to the bill that I have, and that is to the remark of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS]. He said there was no disposition to get these Territories into the Union. There is, I think, some disposition on this side to do that.

Mr. POST, of Wyoming, addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I move that the committee rise and report the bill back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I move by unanimous consent that the Delegates of the Territories have leave to print their remarks on this bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4705) in relation to courts and judicial proceedings in the Territories, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to make an inquiry. The provisions of this bill are broad, and I should like to make an amendment that they shall not apply to the Indian Territory.

Mr. MAGINNIS. There is no Indian Territory except in name.

Mr. BRENTS. This bill applies only to organized Territories.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the blil was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNORS.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I now call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 4713) requiring the governors of certain Territories to be residents of said Territories at least two years preceding appointment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no person shall hereafter be appointed governor of any of the Territories of Arizona, Dakota, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, Utah, Washington, or Wyoming who has not been a resident of the Territory for which he is appointed for at least two years next preceding the date of his appointment.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4713) requiring the governors of certain Territories to be residents of said Territories at least two years preceding appointment, respectfully recommend its passage.

The reasons for this recommendation are so obvious to any one who has considered the subject, that a very brief suggestion of a few of them will, in the opinion of the committee, be sufficient to commend the provisions of the bill to the favorable consideration of the House. It will be conceded that the chief executive officer of these Territories ought to be a person fully acquainted with and fully identified with the people whose welfare is so largely committed to his keeping. He ought not only to be acquainted with the character of the people and the character of the legislation best suited to their wants and necessary for their progress and the development of their material resources, but he should be attached to the soil as a property-holder and by the many social ties growing out of permanent citizenship. Such a person would be careful of his reputation, and would have the strongest motives to deal fairly and honestly by the people.

When these Territories were first organized there was perhaps a solid excuse for the practice which still obtains of sending men from the States to act as governors, but in the opinion of the committee there can be no good reason urged for its continuance. It is, in fact, a vicious practice, inconsistent with the genius of our free institutions, and should no longer be tolerated. These high and important offices have been used quite long enough as rewards for party service or as places of refuge for unsuccessful or disappointed politicians. In nine cases out of ten men have been appointed governors of these Territories who are not only total strangers to the people, but who go, carpet-bag in hand, ready to return to their homes in the States as soon as their term of office expires. They are satisfied, therefore, with drawing their salaries with scrupulous regularity, and with a merely perfunctory discharge of the important duties of their office. They have none of the incentives which would actuate the man whose permanent residence was already fixed in the Territory and whose future was bound up with its people.

With the multiplication of railroads throughout these Territories population has poured into them, and each of them now numbers among its citizens scores of men skilled in political affairs and learned in every branch of knowledge; eminently qualified in every respect to fill these high offices. Why should not the people have the small privilege accorded them of having their chief executive selected from those who are most deeply interested in their social, political, and material welfare?

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. This bill is only intended to apply, as its terms provide, to the organized Territories of the United States. It requires that those who are appointed as governors of those Territories shall have been residents of the Territories to which they are appointed for two years prior to that time. There would not be any objection to this bill but for the Territory of Utah, and I do not think there should be any exception as to Utah.

Mr. HORR. Was this a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Yes, sir; unanimous.

Mr. HORR. A full committee?

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. A full committee.

Mr. HORR. Who originated the bill?

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I introduced it in the House myself.

As I was going on to say, Mr. Speaker, I do not see why even Utah should be excepted. We are now, and have been for years, as all know, dealing with the problem of the Territory of Utah, and I think the best way to solve that problem is to appoint men to control affairs there who have been residents of that Territory and who understand the condition of affairs existing among that people. The sending of a stranger there as the governor of a Territory is generally a mistake, for in the very nature of things it must be several years before he ever finds out what is required or anything about the true condition of the people.

It takes half of his term to find it out as he ought to do and as the obligations of his office impel him to do. For that reason it is urgent, in my mind, that this officer should be a resident and familiar with the people.

Utah is now upon the great thoroughfare leading across the continent to our western coast. It has a large population outside of those who have made themselves inimical to a large number of the people of this country. It has plenty of men, as I understand it, who are fully qualified in every respect—as capable as any man who can be selected from any of the States—to fill the gubernatorial office. I have stated succinctly in the report, as fully as I believe necessary, the reasons why in the judgment of the committee the bill ought to pass. They seem to me to be convincing reasons.

I have had, Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to say, some experience of carpet-bag government. I know what it is, and I think that the great security of the rights of the people in this country is in local self-government, and I want to see the government of this country brought as near to the people as it possibly can.

I now yield——

Mr. KASSON. Before the gentleman from South Carolina sits down I desire to correct one impression he has, or appears to have, that the only objection to be urged against this bill rests upon the case of Utah. To me that is comparatively a small objection, because there are gentiles as well as Mormons in Utah and intelligent people.

The opposition that I feel to this bill rests in the fact that it revolutionizes the long-continued policy and theory of the Government in dealing with the Territories.

They are regarded not as States with constitutions controlling all of their organic functions, but they are recognized as dependent Territories, in the process of attaining statehood, and as it were in trust for all the States of the Union to send to them their emigrants to find homes. Consequently we have always had the advantage of selecting a governor from any of the States of the Union, whose signature is necessary to validate legislative acts which are exclusively Territorial.

Now this bill proposes to take away from the United States the last hold that they have upon the legislation which affects the interests of future immigrants to the Territories.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. KASSON. Not now.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Just in that connection?

Mr. KASSON. Allow me to finish my objection and then I will be glad to yield to any interruption. Then you find that this bill puts the entire interests of all of the United States under the absolute legislative control of a veto held to protect alien interests entirely under the control of the citizens of the Territory.

Mr. BRENTS. But the gentleman will remember that Congress has the power——

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman be kind enough to allow me to complete what I was about to say? I must decline to be interrupted. Congress does not propose to appoint the governor nor the members of the Legislature, I will say to the gentleman; and my point is that the whole legislative power of the Territory is proposed by this bill to be put into the hands of a temporary occupant of that Territory—temporary with reference to the period of time that it is approaching statehood.

And, sir, I have another objection, if the gentleman will yield to me long enough to complete my statement, that it is of the greatest importance that the governor should be free and independent in the exercise of his veto power and approval power of special local interests of the Territory. Under our usage there are repeated acts of the legislative power fixing lines of railroads for given roads; for the location of county seats; questions fixing a capital; all such questions which every one of us who has lived even in the new States have encountered, where it is absolutely essential to the general interests that they shall have so important a functionary as the governor free from local influences. Another reason for the policy heretofore pursued, and which has prevailed up to this time in the selection of a governor from outside, is found in the fact that the local governor is largely under the control, and in the nature of things must be, of all local interest where his enterprises are centered. Now, the very point made in the report and claimed as a strong one in behalf of the bill, that he ought to be so interested in property and matters of local interest in the Territory, is a point against the passage of the bill, because of the fact that so many men in the Territories as we are well aware are transient in their residence and are there only seeking temporary advantages in the selection and acquiring of landed interests, the purchasing of sites near towns, in railroad interests, and other matters of that character.

Now, sir, I maintain that for both these reasons it is of great importance that one functionary of this Territory connected with legislation should represent the interests of all the States of this Union and of all future immigrants into any Territory.

Mr. BRENTS. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. KASSON. I yield first for a question to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS], who first addressed me.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 51) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Rio Grande River between the cities of Eagle Pass, Tex., and Piedras Negras, Mexico;

A bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools;

A bill (S. 478) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department certain parts of the Camp Douglas military reservation, in the Territory of Utah; and

A bill (S. 664) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Rio Grande River between the cities of Laredo, Tex., and Nueva Laredo, Mexico.

GOVERNORS OF TERRITORIES.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS].

Mr. MAGINNIS. The most eloquent speech I ever heard made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] was on the question of the admission of Colorado and was in defense of the new Territories and in denunciation of the very system he has now risen to defend.

Mr. KASSON. Of the system of appointing governors?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. No, sir.

Mr. MAGINNIS. If the gentleman will go back to the debate when on the floor of this House he answered Mr. Potter, of New York, who was objecting to the admission of Colorado, he will find in his own remarks a more eloquent denunciation of this Territorial system than I can hope to make.

Mr. KASSON. Not in regard to the appointment of governors.

Mr. MAGINNIS. But apart from that, for that is merely a personal argument, let us consider the proposition the gentleman has submitted. He says the United States ought by the appointment of one individual to have a control over these Territorial Legislatures. Why did he forget the important fact that after these Legislatures have acted, after these statutes have been passed, after the governor has signed them, this Congress retains to itself the right to review, to annul, to revise, to blot out that whole Territorial legislation whether it has been signed by that governor or not? We, sir, are infinitely more willing to trust the wisdom and action of this representative body of all the people of America than those of any man appointed, as so many are, under political patronage, who goes out to our Territories unidentified with our people, with no interest in common with us, very often a mere adventurer, and, as the gentleman from South Carolina has said, with his carpet-bag in his hand, ready to come away as soon as his term of office expires.

The same objection which the gentleman from Iowa has urged would apply to the governors of all those States. And why? In the early days, when a few hunters and trappers and pioneers merely were found in those Territories, there might have been some force in the gentleman's argument. But now, in the youngest of them men have been born and grown to manhood and cast their first vote in them, without ever having actually voted for the President of the United States in whom this patronage is lodged, and without having any voice as to who shall be their governor. I do not believe in the early days it was intended these Territories should grow to this immense size without being admitted to the Union. But I know there is a growing idea against admitting them to the Union of the States. These great States are jealous of the admission of new Territories. Their Senators are jealous of admitting two Senators from one of these Territories to balance their reputation in the Senate, and in the present state of political parties both are equally careful lest the admission of some new State should influence the balance of political power between them. And under the rules of this House, even although a majority should be in favor of the admission of a new State, a minority could and would successfully resist it. So that there is no hope of the admission of these Territories as States and of the solution of their difficulties and the removal of their grievances in that way.

The only thing then we can fall back upon is to perfect as well as we can the present Territorial system, which I undertake to say is the most infamous system of colonial government that was ever seen on the face of the globe. I go back again to the Potter debate, because I made the same statement then as I do to-day. I ask what are those Territories? They are the colonies of your Republic, situated three thousand miles away from Washington by land, as the thirteen colonies were situated three thousand miles away from London by water. And it is a strange thing that the fathers of our Republic when they threw off the yoke of Great Britain established a colonial government as much worse than that which they revolted against as one form of such government can be worse than another. I made that statement in 1876, and Mr. Potter asked me if the United States Government had ever annulled any of our laws. And the gentleman from Iowa will remember our answer, for we were then both on the same side, that not only particular enactments but the laws of whole sessions of our legislatures had been wiped away by one word.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I will.

Mr. HOPKINS. I sympathize with the gentleman and it is only for my own information that I ask him this question, because in listening to the reading of the report I did not hear the matter alluded to. That which troubles me in this regard is the constitutional question of imposing a limitation upon the appointing power of the President.

Mr. MAGINNIS. There is no doubt that Congress can say who shall be appointed as governors of these Territories.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question in the same direction?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman tell me how the President gets the authority to appoint these Territorial governors at all?

Mr. MAGINNIS. He does not get it under the Constitution, which answers the question of the other gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS]. He gets it from the statutes, and the gentleman knows very well that these Territories are authorized by statutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. The President obtains under the Constitution the right to make appointments.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And Congress has the power under the Constitution to provide officers, and the President obtains from Congress the right to appoint those officers, and Congress has the right to modify that power.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman be kind enough to show me under what law of Congress the President has the power to appoint governors of Territories?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Under the organic acts of the Territories.

Mr. BRUMM. Not under the general power to appoint in the Constitution?

Mr. MAGINNIS. He has the right under the organic acts of the Territories to make the appointments of governors, and the governors are appointed with different powers. Congress has the right to modify that power, and there is no doubt about that.

The only question before this House is in regard to these Territories, great, rich, and powerful as they are, some of them with more wealth and more means than the greatest of the colonies had at the time they threw off the yoke of Great Britain. There are Territories to-day whose exports and imports exceed all the exports and imports of the Colonies of the United States when they established the Government of the United States.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I will.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman believe that this bill is free from any constitutional objection?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Most certainly I do.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman think that this bill imposes no limitation on the power of the President to appoint?

Mr. MAGINNIS. These Territorial governments have grown up outside of the letter of the Constitution.

Mr. HISCOCK. Not so.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And Congress has provided in the organic acts of these Territories how the governors shall be appointed, and Congress can modify those provisions.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the Constitution provides the manner in which officers shall be appointed.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] yield to me to read section 2, article 2 of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. MAGINNIS. No, sir; I do not yield.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. You do not want the Constitution read.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. I feel with my friend from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS]. I believe that the President of the United States would act wisely and do well in the appointment of governors to select persons who reside in the Territories and who have interests with the inhabitants of those Territories. But I submit to my friend that I am troubled with this provision of the Constitution. I read from article 2, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, that instrument which some people do not like to have spoken of.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am glad the gentleman is going to read it.

Mr. EATON. That section declares that "he [the President] shall have power"—to do what?

He [the President] shall have power to * * * appoint ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Now, if my friend will permit me——

Mr. EATON. Wait one moment, if you please. We establish by law that there shall be a governor of the Territory of Montana; and by the Constitution the President of the United States has the undoubted right to nominate and appoint the governor of that Territory. Instead of taking my distinguished friend who is a resident of Montana, who has all his interests there, the President goes to Maine and takes my friend the distinguished Representative from Maine. He has the right to do that; his power in that respect can not be limited.

Mr. MAGINNIS. There is no doubt he has the right to do it under the law; but there is no doubt either that the Congress of the United States has the right to fix the age, residence, and other qualifications of governors of Territories. None in the world. Under those qualifications, as established by law, the President has the right to appoint governors of Territories.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman permit me one question?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I yield to the gentleman from Washington Territory [Mr. BRENTS].

Mr. HORR. I want to ask the gentleman if he considers that Congress has the right by law to confine the President in his selection of a person to be governor of Montana to the residents of one county of Montana?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I have yielded to the gentleman from Washington Territory [Mr. BRENTS].

Mr. BRENTS. There is to-day, Mr. Speaker, one State in this Union that has less population than any one of the eight Territories which hav been named, with one single exception. And that State has the right not only to have one of its own citizens act as its governor, but also the right to elect that governor by the people of that State.

Yet these Territories, and some of them with three times, yes, with five times the population of that State, their people all citizens of the United States, as loyal to the Union as any citizen of the United States, as intelligent as any other citizens of the United States, are denied the right to have one of their own citizens chosen as governor, unless the appointing power may so choose in the selection of that governor.

We all know from experience that pressure is brought to bear upon him to appoint some man from some of the older States who has become obnoxious to his friends, who are influential, and who, to get rid of him, go to the President and persuade and besiege him to appoint this friend of theirs to be the governor of some far-off Territory, in order to expatriate him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it right that the people of the Territory should be so far ignored that they are to be denied the right to have as their governor one of their own citizens, a man acquainted with their wants and necessities, who would know how to administer the government there better than any man who might be chosen from abroad, who has no interest in their welfare, who has no concern in remaining in the Territory except so long as his commission may last?

But the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] and other gentlemen have suggested that we can not put this limitation upon the appointing power of the President so as to require the selection of the governor of a Territory to be made from citizens of that Territory. Mr. Speaker, was Congress obliged to pass the law giving to the President the power to appoint these governors? Is Congress obliged to continue that law in force? Has not Congress the power to-day to repeal that law and allow the people of the Territories, as they ought to be allowed, to elect their governors for themselves? If Congress will not go this far, then I say it is just and right to these Territories that a citizen of the Territory, one who has an interest in the prosperity of the Territory, should be selected.

It is said that there should be some one to represent the Government of the United States in the making of the Territorial laws. Why should not the people of the Territories be allowed to make their own laws? But you do not go that far under this bill. Congress still retains the power to annul every statute passed by every Territory. You still reserve the power to wipe out all Territorial legislation, as well as the Legislature that made it, at any moment you please. Yet gentlemen are afraid that power will be absorbed by the people of the Territories to the detriment of the Government of the United States.

Why, sir, this Government is based upon the right of men to self-government. This right is enunciated in the Declaration of Independence and throughout the Constitution it is intended to be secured to the people of the United States. When the Northwest Territory was organized it was for the avowed purpose of giving the people of that Territory the right of self-government so far as it might be compatible with their situation. The reason full power of self-government was not given to them was simply that they were not considered able to support a government of their own, not because they were incapable mentally or otherwise. Those people were regarded as equals in every respect with the people of the States, except that they had not the adequate population and means to support the burdens of government; consequently the full power of self-government was withheld by Congress until, and only until, they might be able to support a government for themselves. Most of the States that have been admitted into the Union from a Territorial condition have been admitted with far less population than now exists in any of the Territories of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, this is a poor privilege which the people of the Territories ask, that they should have one of their own citizens selected as their governor. I hope this bill may be passed. It is one step in the right direction.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, there can be no question, it seems to me, that this bill is unconstitutional. If you have a right to restrict within a particular Territory the discretion of the President of the United States in the selection of officers under our Constitution, then you can still further restrict it. You can say he shall be limited to a certain county in each Territory. If you have the right to do that you can say he shall be restricted to a certain township. If you have the legal right to make this provision you can limit his selection to residents on a certain street in a certain town, and finally you can bring it down to a certain number on a certain street, and thereby appoint the governor yourself.

Mr. BRENTS. Does that make it unconstitutional?

Mr. HORR. It does. You have just as much right to pass a law prescribing that every judge of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be selected from the State of Ohio—a State which I know would be offended by any such discrimination. [Laughter.] No man would submit to such a violation of the Constitution. Think of it for a moment——

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Among the appointees of the President are cadets to the West Point Academy. Now, by a law long existing and acquiesced in by everybody, those cadets are not only appointed by the President from particular districts, but they are appointed upon the recommendation of members of Congress.

Mr. HORR. They are not officers of the United States at all.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. They are appointees.

Mr. HISCOCK. In the Constitution will be found a provision that Congress shall have power to provide rules and regulations for the Government of the Army and Navy. Now, it has been held that those appointments are constitutional under that provision, that they are a part of the machinery for the government of the Army and Navy.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. But still those appointees are officers.

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir; the question has been fully discussed, and it has been held that those appointments are constitutional in virtue only of the provision of the Constitution to which I have called attention.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, do these interruptions come out of my time?

The SPEAKER. They do, because the gentleman yields.

Mr. HORR. I do not see how I can help myself. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan can not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. HORR. I was observing when you come to carry out this doctrine to its logical effect it is absurd on its face. If the Constitution means anything, it means that the President shall have the power to select these men. This is an attempt to prevent that. Why do our friends from the Territories put on such a terrible face about this matter? We not only pay out of the Treasury of the United States the salaries of the governors of the Territories, but we pay also the members of their Legislatures.

Mr. BRENTS. Give us the privilege of electing them and we will pay for them very gladly.

Mr. HORR. We pay for your representatives in your Legislative Assemblies as they come together.

Mr. BRENTS. Yes, and the money that is paid is put into the Treasury from our taxes just as well as it is from your taxes, and we pay them just as much as you pay them.

Mr. HORR. This matter of distinction between Territories and States is a constitutional distinction, and one which we should never lose sight of. These appointments by the Executive of this nation are made under the Constitution. He has the right to select the men, and such an instance might occur where it would be utterly improper to appoint a man who lives in the Territory.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NICHOLLS. The gentleman from Michigan has created such great disorder we can not hear what is going on. [Laughter.]

Mr. HORR. I did not hear what the gentleman from Georgia said.

Mr. BELFORD. He is trying to call the House to order so that you may be heard.

Mr. WOLFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. WOLFORD. In the first place, so we may understand exactly what is the constitutional provision, I should like to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether the governor of a Territory is an officer of the United States or an officer of the Territory? If he is an officer of the Territory, then there can be no question at all as to the propriety of this bill. Let me ask the gentleman to say whether he is an officer of the Territory or an officer of the United States.

Mr. HORR. He is an officer of the United States.

Mr. BRUMM. Or else the President could not appoint him.

Mr. WOLFORD. I wish to call attention to the Constitution where it says that these are officers of the Territory. The Constitution provides that Congress shall make all needful rules and regulations in regard to these Territories and not the President.

Mr. REED. The Constitution does not mention Territories at all.

Mr. WOLFORD. It does say precisely what I have indicated about these Territories.

Mr. HORR. I had one word to say, and that was that this is an attempt to prescribe the rights of the President in making these appointments, and that it is a field upon which Congress ought not to enter. I believe, and I believe it not only because I think there are Territories to-day that are better to have their governors come from abroad than to have them appointed from them, but I believe the Government of the United States where there are Territories should hold some control over them, and that in doing that we should at least have a right to appoint the officers whom we pay out of the Treasury of the people of the United States as the President may see fit.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I will now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID].

Mr. McCOID. I do not intend to discuss the merits of the bill itself, but I am surprised at the constitutional objection made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON]. There are two questions in regard to the appointee of a Territory; one is who is the appointing power, and that is placed in the President of the United States under the Constitution; the next is who is qualified to be appointed, and that is fixed by Congress itself. Congress may fix the qualifications of the appointee. Why, Congress has done that many a time, and the gentleman from Ohio has the point exactly, for in the case of circuit judges Congress has fixed the limitation that they must reside within their circuits. This is the same question exactly. Take the case of district judges, and they are appointees of the President, but Congress has fixed their qualification, and that is that they must reside within their districts.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is the gentleman from Iowa quite sure the President is limited to appointing them from residents of the district? The law is sure they must reside in their districts. I ask the gentleman if he is quite clear in stating the law in reference to their appointment?

Mr. REED. And if that is the law, has it ever been decided to be constitutional?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not believe it is the law.

Mr. McCOID. I put it upon this, that Congress may fix the qualifications of the appointees.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me ask the gentleman this, whether residence is a part of the qualification?

Mr. McCOID. It may be made so by act of Congress.

Mr. BELFORD. Of course it may.

Mr. McCOID. And the constitutional power is given to us to fix the qualification that the governor must have resided within the Territory two years.

Mr. BRUMM. We might as well make it a qualification that his hair should be of a particular color and that he should be of a particular size.

Mr. BELFORD. I would not object to that if they would make it red. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. Or it might be made a qualification as to his nationality.

A MEMBER. But what about his being a polygamist?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the provisions of this bill to be wise. I can not make much of a statement in three minutes, and shall not try; suffice it to say that in the early settlement of these Territories the tendency is frequently to reckless legislation.

I happen now to have in my mind a statement made to me by a man, since dead, but eminent in the country, who was governor of one of the principal of these Territories a few years ago, and who took occasion to say that he was greatly criticised in the Territory for the reason that by virtue of his veto power he kept the new Legislature, elected from the new residents, from absolutely mortgaging in perpetuity the interests of the Territory and the people to follow.

But this, Mr. Speaker, is a pretty good argument for the necessity of the admission of certain of these Territories as States. I have no doubt that at least Dakota, and probably Washington, ought to be admitted, having far more than population sufficient; and I apprehend that my friends will find that this will be received indeed as but a very poor apology for their failure to provide for the prompt admission of these Territories into the Union as States. It was not contemplated that they should remain Territories for any great length of time; and although I believe that men can be found in Dakota, and perhaps in some of the other Territories as well, who are competent to act as governors, still you can not afford to violate the general rule with safety. The safest rule to follow in Utah and Arizona and all of the Territories, in my judgment, is that the President should have the power under the circumstances existing at the time to appoint the governor, the apt and proper man from either of the Territories or either of the States to fill that place.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire in the brief time allotted to me to read the provisions of the Constitution that have been already cited by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON]; but it affords me great pleasure to join hands with him in defense of the Constitution, and I am grateful, in view of some recent legislation that we have had during this session of Congress, to find that he is now calling attention to its provisions as well as to laws in violation of the Constitution.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID] has attempted to illustrate this bill by the appointment of judges of the district courts. I say to the gentleman that I think he will search the statutes in vain to find what I understand he claims, that the President has ever been limited to a particular territory, to a particular district or to a State in making his selections to fill any office. It is true that we have the power doubtless to prescribe the qualifications of offices to some extent. That has been always done by Congress. But I submit to the gentleman from Iowa, and to any other gentleman who favors the passage of this bill, if residence has ever yet been construed as a question of qualification.

Gentlemen around me say that it has been. I would like to know when, by what act, or what judicial decision.

Mr. RANNEY. By the Constitution of the United States itself.

Mr. HISCOCK. It says that Representatives shall be residents of the States, and as I recall that provision of the Constitution it then goes on to provide that they shall possess certain other qualifications.

Mr. BELFORD. They have to be residents.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, yes; but the word "residents" in that sense is distinct from the qualifications required here, and I ask my friend from Massachusetts to give his opinion upon that point.

Mr. McCOID. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the language of the Constitution:

> No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of 25 years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman claim that that imposes residence as a qualification?

Mr. McCOID. It is a part of the provision of the Constitution; a part of the condition requisite.

Mr. HISCOCK. It says in so many words that he shall be a resident of the State. Then, as I recall it, in prescribing the qualifications of electors it says:

> That they shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature—

Making a clear distinction between the terms.

Mr. BRENTS. I would like to read a clause——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, if the power of the President to appoint carried with it the power to create the office the argument of the gentleman from New York and others would have more force. But the Congress creates the office for which the President makes the appointment, and Congress may annex to the office the qualifications of the officer. Whether they be previous examples or not, it seems to my mind clear that Congress has the right to annex any qualification that in its wisdom it may think proper for the person who is to fill the office.

The power of the President to appoint is not interfered with by the qualification which Congress annexes to the office. That is about all I desire to say. I like the idea of local self-government. I believe it is competent for Congress to annex this condition to the qualification for the office of governor, and shall therefore support the bill.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. I journeyed to the West a great many years ago, and I was accompanied and followed by thousands of people who went with me from the East. These Eastern people occupied all these Territories except those who have come from the South. That is the condition of affairs in the far West.

Years ago, as a beardless lad, as an Eastern boy, I had the courage to seek my home under the shelter of the Rocky Mountains. Talk about the constitutional power of the President to select a boy or a man in any of these States. Go to my own State and to a mining camp, and my dear friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] will find a boy dressed in red jeans working in a mine who has graduated at Harvard or Yale College. Can not the President of the United States find one of these enterprising persons who have crossed the plains, who have built up commonwealths, can not he find one there who is competent to discharge the duties of the office of governor of a Territory? The trouble with you Eastern fellows is you are making boots and baskets, while we are making States and commonwealths. All our ideas are enlarged by our surroundings. With our broad and expansive plains, with our grand and magnificent mountains, with the energy and strength of the young men who have left the East to build up that vast country, can not you trust the President of the United States to select from their number one at least as governor for a Territory? Are we not capable of self-government? When did we lose that power? You gave us our courage and our brains and our education in the East. Are you afraid to trust us now when we have crossed the whole continent and enlarged the trail of the pioneer into the pathway of empire?

Gentlemen, we are for the East and for the South, for the North and for the West, because our population is an agglomeration of the brightest brains of the whole of the sections of this Republic.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I yield five minutes to my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am rejoiced that several gentlemen on the other side of the House are contending to-day that there is some limitation on the discretion of Congress by virtue of certain provisions of the Constitution. But the discretion they deny to Congress they claim for the one-man power, which is worse still. They quote many passages that they regard as authority for the President to make the appointments of gubernatorial officers for the Territories in his discretion despite the will of Congress.

Now, sir, the joy I first felt that they were still willing to cite the Constitution, that they were still willing to respect it as not obsolete, was dashed and marred, I must confess, by their abdicating their own plainly granted powers in behalf of a despotism on the part of the Executive. Since a number of extracts from this not quite yet obsolete instrument have been quoted, I beg leave to read a short passage myself:

> The Congress shall have power * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. (Article 1, section 8, clause 18.)

That, sir, is the most comprehensive provision of the Constitution; in fact, it is the mainspring of the whole machinery of our Government, with the people to wind it up. I would like to know what there is to prevent Congress from passing a law to regulate every branch of the civil service or to provide a government for the Territories by annexing any qualification or condition it pleases of age, residence, or otherwise that it thinks fit, which the President must respect in making an appointment. The only limitation on the discretion of Congress in that respect is that which the Constitution itself provides in the way of age and residence and citizenship for the President and Vice-President and for members of the Senate and House and for Presidential electors.

Congress can not pass any act to add to or detract from the prescribed qualifications for these elective officers. But it can attach any qualification it pleases to any other officer or agent of this Government, and the Executive is bound to respect it. I wish I had time to pay my respects to the carpet-bag officials who have been intriguing, blundering, and domineering in the Territories as they used to do in the South, but I am sorry I have not the opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS] has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I think the bill has been sufficiently discussed; but my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] desires a few minutes. I yield him three minutes.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I had concluded the time I had asked for was not to be allotted me, and what I had to say has passed from my mind somewhat. [Laughter.] But when the gentleman from South Carolina and the report itself refer to the citizens of this Republic who go and locate in the Territories as carpet-baggers, I think, sir, I ought at least to protest, though this is not in the line of what I wish to say on this bill. When I traveled across the Territories of this Republic last summer I looked upon them as a part of my inheritance, as a part of my country, into which I had a right to go and be called a citizen and not a carpet-bagger. I count it an insult upon citizenship, a slander upon my countrymen, to call them carpet-baggers anywhere between the oceans. To whom do the Territories belong? Is the first there always to charge the second and succeeding comer with being a carpet-bagger?

Mr. BELFORD. Columbus was the first carpet-bagger we ever had.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. We are all carpet-baggers of course in one sense, but not in an offensive sense. If an honorable gentleman from New York or elsewhere is appointed governor of one of the Territories, is he a carpet-bagger in the sense that he is out of place? I protest against it. I do not believe any man clothed in his right mind will charge a thing of that kind. If my friend from South Carolina should be appointed as governor in one of these Territories, and I have not the least doubt in the world but that he would make an excellent one and I shall expect he will be appointed if the Democrats get into power, I should be ashamed of myself if I were to taunt him with being a carpet-bagger because he comes from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania allude to me?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope then the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him long enough to define what I mean by carpet-baggers.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; if it does not take my last half-minute.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, what the South means by a carpet-bagger, what I mean by a carpet-bagger, is a stranger who leaves his country for his country's good and goes among a people with whom he has no sympathy, and of whose affairs he knows nothing, to get office and nothing but office, and who prostitutes that office for personal or private gain—who, when he can no longer steal from and rob and oppress the people according to the forms of law, gathers up his carpet-sack and leaves as he came, in a hurry. Any one who goes into the Territories or into the Southern States to share the fortune of the people for weal or woe is not looked upon as a carpet-bagger. We are prepared to welcome any man who comes to South Carolina or anywhere else in the South to become part and parcel of us; but we feel it both a duty and a pleasure to abhor and denounce the ravenous bird of passage that comes armed with authority to prey upon the community. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman pleases, I notice when he refers to carpet-baggers he does so with much feeling. If all are carpet-baggers who have gone South and are going into the Territories and all carpet-baggers are robbers, the prospects are not flattering. Some gentleman on the other side of the House said the other day, "The people of the North are welcome to come South if they will only behave themselves!" I would hardly count it a cordial invitation to invite the gentleman from South Carolina to come and live in my State "if he would only behave himself." It goes without saying that an American citizen is to behave himself.

I always assume that every American citizen will do this. The gentleman would imply that the rule is the other way, that a man must prove his purpose to "behave," or he becomes a carpet-bagger, and being a carpet-bagger he is a robber! The Committee on Territories say in their report carpet-baggers are appointed as governors, and the inference is that robbers are appointed. The gentlemen make out too strong a case.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS] has one minute of his time remaining.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask one question in reference to the Constitution——

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I do not think there is any constitutional question involved here; I do not think we have any trouble on that point. When the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania] spoke of the offensive language which had been used I supposed he referred to the report of the committee. Before drafting that report I made some inquiries of gentlemen here who represent the Territories as to whether persons appointed governors of those Territories had gone there with the intention of becoming citizens of the Territories or went there merely to act as governors and after their terms had expired returned to the States, and in every instance I was informed that they returned after their terms had expired. [Here the hammer fell.] I now call the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRUMM. That is, if a question of constitutionality be a question of order.

The SPEAKER. It is not; it is a question for each member of the House to determine for himself when he comes to vote.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask unanimous consent to be heard for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] asks unanimous consent to speak for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. BRUMM. I desire——

Mr. HARDEMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDEMAN. It is whether after the previous question has been called a gentleman can speak upon the bill?

The SPEAKER. Of course not; except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Then I object.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. As the time occupied in the debate of this bill——

Mr. HARDEMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order; the gentleman is propounding a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. As the time for debate upon this bill has been controlled by the friends of the bill, I desire to inquire if the demand for the previous question shall be voted down whether it would then be in order to fix some limit for debate, so that there may be more time for debate.

The SPEAKER. This bill is being considered in the House, not in Committee of the Whole; and there is no such thing as limiting debate upon it except by the application of the previous question or by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then if the previous question is voted down we can continue the debate?

The SPEAKER. The debate will go on, of course, if the demand for the previous question is voted down.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STRUBLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STRUBLE. Some time ago the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] moved an amendment to the bill. What has become of that amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not move an amendment; the gentleman inquired of the Chair whether the bill was open to amendment. The Chair stated that it was, but that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS] then had the floor and could not be taken off without his consent.

Mr. STRUBLE. Is it in order now to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question has been ordered upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 93, noes 24.

So (no further count being called for) the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Would it be in order at this stage of the proceedings to move to commit this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. As I deem this question should have the judgment of the Committee on the Judiciary upon it, I move that this bill be committed to that committee.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I hope that will not be done.

The question was taken upon the motion to commit; and upon a division there were—ayes 46, noes 87.

So (no further count being called for) the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I now call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HART. Is it in order, Mr. Speaker, to move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Territories with instructions?

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. We have just passed upon that question.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit has not yet been been made after the demand for the previous question. The motion made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] was before the previous question was demanded, and therefore was not covered by the new rule of the House or by ordinary parliamentary law.

Mr. HART. I move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Territories with instructions to so amend it as to exclude the Territory of Utah from its operation.

Mr. EVINS of South Carolina. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being 45 in the affirmative—more than one-fifth.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is now nearly 5 o'clock. Should the House now adjourn, would not this bill come up as unfinished business tomorrow?

The SPEAKER. It would not. It would be unfinished business when the House shall again pass to the consideration of this order of business.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the previous question has been moved.

The SPEAKER. It has not been ordered.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, many members here are not aware what the proposed instructions to the committee are.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HART] moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Territories with instructions to report it back to the House with a provision excluding the Territory of Utah from its operation.

Mr. MAGINNIS. There are just as good gentiles, just as bitter anti-Mormons, in the Territory of Utah as there are outside of it, and men just as fit to be governor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 73, nays 127, not voting 122; as follows:

YEAS—73.

So the motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, with Mr. PAIGE, on this question.

Mr. BELFORD with Mr. NICHOLLS, for to-day.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I rise to a privileged question. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS], the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories, has stated that this bill had the unanimous support of that committee. In that statement he inadvertently made this mistake: the bill was adopted by the committee on the 22d of February——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think this is a privileged question; but if there be no objection the gentleman can make his statement.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I was not present at that meeting, being absent on account of duties upon another committee. If I had been present I could not have supported this bill; and I can not support it now with the name of the Territory of Utah included in it.

I should have made this statement earlier had I not, with other members on this side, supposed, until the previous question was ordered, that the amendment of my colleague from Ohio striking out Utah was pending.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. What I meant to say was that there was no opposition to the bill in the committee when it was agreed to report it to the House.

I now call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to amend the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order now.

The bill was passed.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title of the bill. I ask that the amendment be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the title the words "by restricting the appointing power of the President," so that the title will read "A bill requiring the governors of certain Territories to be residents of said Territories at least two years preceding appointment, by restricting the appointing power of the President."

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now I wish to be heard in support of that amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. To what does the gentleman object? The question is open to debate. The previous question has not been ordered on this.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The Constitution provides in the paragraph which has been referred to by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] that the President—

Shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law.

Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States must be a natural-born citizen. "The Congress may determine the time of choosing electors and the day on which they shall give their votes for President;" but the Constitution does not give Congress the power to say where those electors shall live. It simply provides for the counting of the ballots, and declares that the person having the majority of the whole number of the electoral votes for President shall be the President. Again, the language of the Constitution is very explicit that "no person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President." [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. It further provides, that "neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of 35 years and been fourteen years a resident of the United States."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that under the Constitution of the United States the people of the United States can elect none but a natural-born citizen or a man who has been for fourteen years a resident of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. At this time a native-born citizen and no one else can be elected President of the United States; neither can any one be elected Vice-President of the United States, who is to take the place of President in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, except a native-born citizen of the United States.

Now, under the Constitution of the United States the President is empowered to "nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint" all Federal officers, from the embassadors down, whether in the Departments here or in the Federal offices anywhere else in the country. It provides that he "shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, he shall appoint"—where from? From the District of Columbia? If you will look through these Departments in Washington you will find that not only the President but the heads of the Departments and chiefs of bureaus have used and abused the appointing power until the District of Columbia, which has been very greedy, is fully represented in them, while the States south and west are not represented according to population.

This bill goes upon the theory that there shall be no taxation without representation in the Territories. In theory that is good; but the injustice practiced upon the good citizens of the Territories is and has been for twenty years applied to my State and to other States, while the District of Columbia and a few States like Ohio and Indiana have enjoyed special advantages and favors from the appointing powers.

Mr. CLAY. If my colleague will yield to me I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will if my colleague will put down his hat and wait until I get through.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will call for the previous question if the gentleman will yield to me.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for order.

Mr. CLAY. If my colleague will yield to me I will call for the previous question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. My colleague is a young member of the House and does not know that is contrary to the rules where a member is occupying the floor.

Mr. CLAY. I thought the gentleman yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair did not understand that he yielded for that purpose.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will yield to my friend from New York to make his motion.

Mr. PARKER. It being evident that the gentleman has started out for an elaborate argument, he has yielded to me, and I will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I yield for that purpose and no other.

Mr. PARKER. It is perfectly apparent the gentleman proposes to occupy an hour, and we might as well adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no!

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to his yielding for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not object to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would he still be entitled to the floor when the consideration of this question is resumed?

Mr. PARKER's motion was disagreed to, and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will yield to me I will move the previous question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. PARKER. I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has announced the result. Of course if the gentleman rose in time and demanded a division the Chair would recognize him.

The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I was about to remark that the President not only has the power under the Constitution of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make these appointments, but he has exercised it from the very foundation of the Government down to this hour. You may say that that power has been abused. I believe it. You may say that he enters into corrupt bargains, if you please, with men in the other end of the Capitol to secure the advice and consent of the Senate. I will not contest it. You may say that the President of the United States abused his power in many and various ways. I am not here to defend him. You may argue that the President appoints his Cabinet. I will reply it is under that clause of the Constitution, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," the President appoints and those appointments are confirmed by the Senate. It is done by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. [Loud cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Gentlemen seem unable to control their impatience upon this question. I am arguing a constitutional question in good faith, and as a Representative here upon this floor I have the right to be heard. [Cries of "Vote!"] If gentlemen calling for a vote have not decency enough to permit me to proceed, then let them go home or retire to the cloak-rooms.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed without interruption.

Mr. BUDD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUDD. The parliamentary inquiry that I desire to make is whether a member making a motion to amend the title of a bill can enter into a discussion of the merits of the whole proposition? I make the point of order that the gentleman is not confining himself to the motion he has made to amend the title.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that by the rules of the House each member is confined to the question under debate.

Mr. BUDD. I make the point of order that he is not confining himself to the question under debate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from California is a young member. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUDD. The gentleman from Kentucky must confine himself to the question before the House, which is a proposition to amend the title of the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The young man from California does not understand the rules. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUDD. What did the gentleman from Kentucky say?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I said that the gentleman is a young member and does not understand the rules.

Mr. BUDD. Then I want the gentleman from Kentucky to understand that though I am a young member I understand the rules as well as he does.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Under the clause of the Constitution which I have quoted the Secretary of the Treasury has been appointed and confirmed. Under the law on the statute-books that Secretary of the Treasury is instructed, as every other Cabinet officer should be compelled to do, to distribute his appointments among the people of Territories and the States according to population.

Mr. BUDD. Mr. Speaker, I insist upon the question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is not confining himself to the question before the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I shall proceed to discuss the amendment. I will have the Clerk read it to the House, so the House may understand the point which I am making on the amendment which I have offered to the title.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then let it be read as a part of my own remarks. [Great laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be again read in the time of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The proposed amendment was again read.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of my aged friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON], who has been considering the question of Presidential succession and will soon appeal to his side of the House for support on a measure to bridge us over perhaps another great emergency, to this fact, that the importance of the Presidential office can not be overestimated.

Mr. BUDD. I want to know whether or not under the rules of the House the Speaker may not exercise the power to keep this member, who does not seem to know the rules, within bounds?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed in order.

Mr. BUDD. Unless he confines himself to the question under discussion I ask that he be made to take his seat.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to the question under debate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will endeavor to confine myself to the amendment in all seriousness.

This bill is a bill to restrict the appointing power of the President. My amendment——

Mr. BUDD rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Kentucky has a perfect right under the rules of the House to show that such is the character of the bill, and therefore that the title ought to be amended accordingly. So long as the gentleman confines himself to that point the gentleman is entitled to proceed without interruption.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I thank the Chair for explaining to the young man from California what he does not seem to know. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUDD. When I ask thanks from any man I should prefer it to be from one who respects the rules himself. If I am a young member I understand my place better than the gentleman from Kentucky does his.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That is merely the opinion of the young man.

The bill we are about to pass with this title is a bill to restrict the appointing power of the most important office to which any American citizen can be elected under the laws and Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Or to which any one can be elected anywhere.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I accept the amendment of my distinguished friend from New York.

Now, sir, we propose to restrict the appointing power of the greatest officer in our nation. By this bill we propose to say that the President of the United States shall select a man from Utah to be governor of Utah; that the President shall select a man from Arizona to be governor of Arizona; that the President shall select a resident of Montana, of Idaho, of Washington Territory, of Wyoming, of Dakota, or of any of the Territories; that he shall select residents, and no other persons, from those Territories to fill the offices of governors of those Territories.

Mr. BRENTS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Certainly, for a question in good faith.

Mr. BRENTS. I ask the gentleman if he considers the ordinance of 1787 repugnant to the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. WHITE. I do not consider that higher than the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BRENTS. Let me read to the gentleman——

Mr. WHITE. I do not yield for that. If the gentleman desires he can print from his book.

Mr. BRENTS. Does the gentleman not know that under the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the territory of the United States north of the Ohio River the great magna chartea of territorial government for this country passed while the convention which framed the constitution was in session, and continued in force long afterward, required the governors of those territories, or districts, as they were called, to be residents and owners of 1,000 acres of real estate therein?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I think so. I am not contending that the object of this bill is not a good one. My heart and soul are with my friend from Washington Territory. The people of Washington Territory may have been outrageously wronged in some of the officers they have had, and if it were not for the rules of this House, which confine me strictly to the discussion of the pending question, I would point to the fact that a man has been appointed from my own State to be governor of Utah who is not fit for that office. But I can not say that now, because it is contrary to the rules of the House to digress from the amendment under consideration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, are we greater than our fathers? Are we greater than the founders of this Republic? Do we propose to say that the present Executive of the United States shall be shorn of certain powers given to the Chief Executive of the people of this nation under the Constitution simply because we do not like him and do not like some of his appointees; simply because a Senator in the other wing of the Capitol may advise the President to nominate a man——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please confine himself to a discussion of the amendment.

Mr. BUDD. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUDD. The language of the gentleman from Kentucky has been taken down. The Chair has ruled three times that he must confine himself to the subject-matter before the House. If the Chair will cause the gentleman's argument to be read, the Chair will see that, in direct violation and contempt of the rulings of the Chair, this gentleman from Kentucky has kept on violating the rule. I want to know whether the orders of the Speaker can be enforced or whether a man can violate the rulings of the Chair with impunity?

The SPEAKER. A gentleman has no right to violate a ruling of the Chair. If he is not satisfied with the ruling he can appeal to the House.

Mr. BUDD. I wish to know what remedy we have against these violations of the rulings of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that it is very difficult of course for the Chair to determine exactly when a gentleman on the floor departs from the discussion of the question under debate. But the Chair does not think the gentleman from Kentucky has confined himself to the question before the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I accept the ruling of the Chair with all respect and in all meekness, because I respect the superior knowledge of the Chair. But with all deference to the Speaker I am compelled to make these remarks. I have a very high regard for the Constitution of our fathers.

Mr. BUDD. I insist upon the gentleman from Kentucky not proceeding unless he confines himself to the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to confine the gentleman to the question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If this bill passes it ought to be amended as I have suggested, because as it now is it says to the President of the United States, "You must select a governor for each of the Territories from among the citizens residing in the Territory." Now, if we can do that, we can also say that a man shall not be appointed who shall not have been a resident there for six months or six days. Under that rule the President might give the wink to a man in New York, whom he desired to appoint as governor, say of Utah, to go to Utah, buy a piece of land and live there for six months or six days, and then nominate him, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint him, and thus conform to your law. I will say to my friends from the Territories that I have no more respect than they have for the mode of making Territorial appointments.

But this bill does not provide the way to remedy the evil. The way to do so is to wait—wait until after the next November election. No State, except perhaps Ohio, Massachusetts, Maine, and Connecticut, has its quota of appointments in the Treasury Department. Under the act of Congress March 3, 1875, it is provided that on and after January 1, 1876, the appointments of this Department (Treasury) shall be so arranged as to be equally distributed between the several States of the United States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, according to population.

What is your remedy? There is the law on your statute-book; there is a Republican officer administering that law, and yet the clerks are not appointed according to law. Who is to blame, and what is the remedy? The remedy is at the next election. Under the law giving more clerks to the Pension Office each State was entitled to receive appointments pro rata according to population; yet Indiana gets many more appointments, with better salaries, than any other State. In the Pension Office alone Indiana gets ninety-four appointees, with $129,940 salary; Kentucky gets twenty-two, with $25,340 salary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] will confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky (continuing). I ask you to wait until after the Presidential election. That is the way to remedy this evil.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself to the question before the House or take his seat and let the House decide the question. It is a very simple question, whether or not the title of the bill should be amended as indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. With all deference to the Chair I desire to confine myself to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please do so, then.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now, after having had my attention called so often to the fact that I am departing from the amendment, I desire to try and please all members who think I am not confining myself to the question before the House by conforming to the good advice of the Chair to confine myself strictly to the amendment.

What is that amendment? It is to add to the title of the bill the words "by restricting the appointing power of the President." Now, the appointing power of the President is a constitutional power, a power which is not restricted except by the modifying clause of the Constitution which I have read.

Mr. BRENTS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. No; not now.

Mr. BRENTS. I am afraid the gentleman will close his remarks prematurely.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. This is the modifying clause of the Constitution: that the President—

Shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint—shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law.

Shall appoint whom?—

Now, that is the Constitution of our country, which we have sworn to support. If it has been found that the President has done wrong, has abused the appointing power, this bill, which is intended to rectify that wrong, can not do so. That can only be done by a constitutional amendment restricting the appointing power of the President. At the next election you can, under the Constitution, remove the evil by electing a man as President who will not abuse the high trust reposed in him by 55,000,000 of people. I now yield the floor.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I call the previous question.

Mr WHITE, of Kentucky. I reserve the remainder of my time, in case any other gentleman desires to speak against the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. Will it be in order now to move the previous question on the title of the bill?

The SPEAKER. That has been done by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS].

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment to the title offered by Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will stand as reported.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference. I think there will be no objection to that.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Unless the same privilege can be granted to all I must object.

Mr. SPRINGER. After occupying the time of the House for a half an hour for nothing, I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. It was on constitutional questions, of which the gentleman is totally ignorant.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Before submitting that question, if there is no objection the Chair will lay before the House sundry executive communications.

There was no objection.

BARRACKS ON DAVID'S ISLAND, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER accordingly laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting plans and estimates for barracks and officers' quarters at David's Island, New York Harbor, and asking an appropriation of $129,466.20 therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department building, asking an appropriation of $4,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for fuel, light, repairs, and miscellaneous items for the State, War, and Navy Department building for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

And then the motion of Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. WILSON. I present resolutions of the Davenport Academy of Sciences, of Davenport, Iowa, in opposition to any changes in the patent laws of the United States tending to injuriously affect the rights and interests of inventors or tending to discourage inventions. [Joint resolution No. 9.]

Joint resolution in regard to grants of public land to railroads.

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa—

First. That in view of the rapid absorption of the public lands of the United States fit for settlement, we do hereby earnestly request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence so that where grants of public land have been made directly to any corporation to aid in building railroads, and the terms of said grants have not been substantially complied with, steps may be immediately taken to have the unearned portion of such lands revert to the United States that the same may be thrown open to settlement.

Second. That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved March 27, 1884.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 459) to refund excessive duties caused by extraordinary overvaluation of the Austrian florin in the year 1878, direct me to report the same adversely and recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. For reasons known to the Senator from Tennessee I think it important to have the bill placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course there is no objection to its going on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. It may be necessary to present the views of the minority when I shall have an opportunity of reading the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly; there is no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask leave for the minority of the committee to submit their views in this case if they desire to do so.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly; there is no objection to that. There is a written report, and perhaps the printing of it had better be delayed until the Senator from Ohio prepares the views of the minority.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would prefer to have the report printed, and it may be that I shall not desire to submit the views of the minority.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well; let the report be printed then, and let the views of the minority be filed at such time as may suit the convenience of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority will be granted leave to file their views hereafter, if there be no objection.

Mr. HILL. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have had under consideration the bill (S. 17) to provide for the establishment of a postal telegraph system, the bill (S. 227) to establish a system of postal telegraphs in the United States, and the bill (S. 1016) to provide for the transmission of correspondence by telegraph, and have instructed me to report an original bill to establish a postal telegraph system and recommend its passage.

The bill (S. 2022) to establish a postal telegraph system was read twice by its title.

Mr. HILL. I am also instructed to inform the Senate that the committee voted unanimously to report favorably the first ten sections of the bill relating to contracts for the service, but that a minority of the committee was opposed to that part of the bill which provides for purchasing or constructing lines. The committee will ask the privilege at a day in the near future of submitting a report in writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the committee will have leave to submit a written report at some future time.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred an amendment submitted by Mr. HOAR March 31, 1884, intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, reported it with an unfavorable recommendation, and moved its reference to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 723) for the relief of Eugene B. Rail and others, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 879) for the relief of P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased; and

A bill (S. 534) for the relief of J. S. Pickett.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment as a substitute for the amendment reported by Mr. SHERMAN from that committee on April 7 to the bill (S. 1876) providing for an inspection of meats for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases, and for other purposes; and the bill was ordered to be reprinted, with the proposed amendment.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 2023) granting a pension to William J. Lee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 2024) for the relief of Boynton Leach, late a lieutenant in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVILEGES OF THE FLOOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate under the call for resolutions a resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr PLUMB] which went over under the rule. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXXIII be amended by adding after the words "the heads of Departments," in the seventh line of the rule as printed for the use of the Senate, the following: "including the Commissioner of Agriculture."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that the resolution had better be referred to the Committee on Rules. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1565) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas, in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas;

A bill (H. R. 4713) requiring the governors of certain Territories to be residents of said Territories at least two years preceding appointment; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 224) granting certain publications to the Cincinnati law library.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution directing the enrolling clerk of the House in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor, to substitute the word "therefor" for the word "thereof" where it last appears in the Senate amendment amending the title of said bill.

THOMAS G. CORBIN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII, commencing at Order of Business 230, being Senate bill 427.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 427) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 4, after the word "of," it is proposed to insert "shore;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to said Thomas G. Corbin, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the difference of shore-pay to which he would have been entitled had he been promoted on the active-list in the regular order of seniority, and been retired as rear-admiral on attaining the age of sixty-two years; and a sufficient sum for the purpose, to be computed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to and goes over.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask the Senator not to enter any objection, because the bill can be considered in five minutes as well as in five hours. The report has been read and I will state very briefly what the claim of Mr. Corbin is.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I would not rise now after the reading of the report yesterday except to answer some adverse criticism made yesterday to this bill. The case stands exactly in this wise: Thomas G. Corbin is a distinguished officer of the United States Navy. His record is one of the best. There is no officer of the Navy who has a better record than that of Mr. Corbin. He was appointed acting midshipman in 1838, and passed through all the intermediate grades of the service, having acquitted himself in a most meritorious and gallant manner throughout the entire war, and in July, 1866, was promoted to the rank of captain, when he was asked to appear before the examining board for promotion to the grade of commodore. He appeared before the medical board and was examined as to his physical qualifications. He was passed by that board, and his moral qualifications were considered and passed. When he was asked to appear before the board for professional examination Mr. Corbin protested. He said that it was not the intention of the law to demand that an officer of his grade in the service, who had rendered long and distinguished service, should appear before a board of examining officers to determine as to his professional qualifications; that that was to be determined from the record itself in the possession of the Navy Department, and in the possession of the examining board. Mr. Fairfax, who was a captain in the Navy at the time, also protested against appearing before the board to be examined professionally, the claim being that the law did not require it.

Up to 1862, on the passage of the act under which the board claimed the right to demand Captain Corbin's appearance, no officer of the Navy was ever permitted to appear before the board, and owing to some complaint being made by officers that they had been unjustly treated by the board the law was amended so as to give to the officers the right to appear if they saw fit. Captain Corbin did not want to appear before the board, and claimed that, under the law, the other officers of the Navy who had served with him and who knew of his qualifications could be examined as to his fitness professionally, and also that the records of the Navy Department would show to the satisfaction of any board that he was entitled to promotion by reason of professsional fitness.

I will call attention to the recommendations made by officers of the Navy of equal rank with Captain Corbin, that of Rear-Admiral C. H. Davis, who was called before the board to give testimony with regard to Captain Corbin's fitness, that of Commodore C. R. P. Rodgers, that of Capt. D. M. Fairfax. These and a dozen others were called before the examining board and questioned as to the fitness of Captain Corbin for promotion. What do they say? Commodore Rodgers, in answer to the question, "Would you, as commander of a squadron, have sufficient confidence in Captain Corbin to send him on an important separate service in command of a vessel of war?" says, "I would. I should esteem myself happy in having such an officer to send on any service."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to have it extended for a few moments if there is no objection. I ask unanimous consent that I may state the whole case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from New Jersey proceeding with his remarks?

Mr. McPHERSON. All the testimony that had ever been asked by any board of naval officers was before that board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey will please suspend until the Chair ascertains whether there is objection.

Mr. McPHERSON. I supposed that consent had been given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from New Jersey proceeding with his remarks? The Chair hears none. The Senator from New Jersey will proceed.

Mr. McPHERSON. As I was saying, there was all the testimony before that board that had ever been demanded by any board of naval officers before in the world. Captain Corbin did not think they had the right to call him, and for some reasons which perhaps it is as well not to state, except to say that it is well known there was some feeling existing between the officers of that board and Captain Corbin, and they claimed the right under the law to humiliate——

Mr. COCKRELL. If there is any reason why Captain Corbin ought not to have gone before the board I should like to know it. Just let the Senate know it.

Mr. McPHERSON. The reason was that Captain Corbin believed the law did not require it, and, as I said before, there had never been an examining board of naval officers in the history of the Government which had asked an officer of Captain Corbin's grade to appear before the board for professional examination.

Fairfax was also required to appear before the board. He protested. The Senate of the United States two years ago promoted him and placed him back on the list where he would have been if the board had not retired him. Captain Corbin's case was before the Senate two years ago and I think it passed the Senate almost unanimously, but by reason of some delay at the other end of the Capitol the bill did not get through Congress. These are the only two cases of which I have any knowledge. The bill proposes to place Captain Corbin exactly where he would have been had it not been for the adverse action of the board.

The law did not require Captain Corbin, unless he wished, to appear before the board for professional examination. Let me read a portion of a letter written by Mr. G. V. Fox, for many years Assistant Secretary of the Navy, to Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS. He says:

The act of July 16, 1862, neither required nor permitted the presence of any officer whose case was pending. This was made a subject of complaint by those who suffered from the action of the board; but it was more specious than valid, because the true measure of merit entitling an officer of the senior grades to promotion is not an oral examination, but the record of his whole career on the files of the Navy Department as established by himself. The inefficient clamored to be present, because before a board where there was no public prosecutor they hoped to exert a personal and sympathetic influence. They reasoned well, and the authors of section 3, act of April 21, 1864, offset it by requiring that those who chose to be present should be "examined," and the board were also required to use "any matter on the files and records of the Department touching each case."

In other words, the entire option was left, both previous to the law of 1862 and after the passage of the law of 1862, that the officer might or might not appear personally before the board. Captain Corbin preferred not to appear, claiming that it was his right under the law. The board did not recommend him for promotion, and consequently under the law he was placed upon the retired-list of the Navy.

Captain Corbin was a Southern man, and during the war held firmly and devotedly to the Union. He fought the battles of the Union as well and as valiantly as any officer in the Navy. There is no officer to-day in the United States Navy whose record stands better, and it was all there for the examining board to review. After his refusal, as he thought he had the right to refuse under the law, to appear personally for examination, he was placed upon the retired-list, and thus humiliated.

As I said before, there are but two cases within my recollection. There is the case of Fairfax, who three years ago was restored by the Senate with exactly and precisely the same legislation that Captain Corbin now appeals to the Senate for in justification of his course. That is the whole case.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not desire to interfere any more than I can help with a committee that I am not connected with; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the line which we are now pursuing occasionally in reference to retirements and promotions after retirement.

The Congress of the United States first passed a law to retire Army and Navy officers in 1862. After they are retired Congress is required to take up a great portion of its time in discussing the question as to whether they have been retired properly or not. I do not know how many such cases have been before the Committee on Naval Affairs at this Congress, but I know that a great many have been before the Committee on Military Affairs which have not been reported.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to put in one word there. Mr. Corbin was retired under a technical retirement. There was no reason for his retirement.

Mr. LOGAN. What do you call a "technical retirement?"

Mr. McPHERSON. He was retired under a strict construction of the law.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the way all retirements are made.

Mr. McPHERSON. And such a construction as was never put upon it before.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know anything about "technical retirement." I understand that when a man is retired from the Army or Navy he is retired from active duty and put on a retired-list, which is a mere pension-list, though it has a different name. This man was retired under the law the same as others have been retired, by the vote of a board. That is the way retirements are decided upon, both in the Army and in the Navy. His case having come before the board, they required him to appear before the board for the purpose I suppose of an examination of some character, I do not know what, perhaps as to his ability or capacity or something of that kind; I can not tell why. He utterly refused to obey their orders.

He was retired on the rank that he held at the time. Now he comes before Congress and asks you to retire him as a rear-admiral. Will the Senator please explain to the Senate why he should be retired as a rear-admiral?

Mr. McPHERSON. I will explain that in one word to the Senator. He claimed that he was unjustly retired.

Mr. LOGAN. How was that?

Mr. McPHERSON. He was retired as a captain. If he had not been retired at that time as a captain he to-day would have been a rear-admiral upon the retired-list.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to know how you ascertain that to be a fact?

Mr. McPHERSON. By the regular order of promotion. Those who were associated with him upon the Naval Register have reached the same position.

Mr. LOGAN. All who were associated with him?

Mr. McPHERSON. I can not say as to all.

Mr. LOGAN. The law in reference to retirement in the Navy has been wholly changed since this man was retired, and there can be but one appointment where two rear-admirals are retired. Whether he would have come in the list of rear-admirals or commodores is a proposition that I do not think the Senator can answer.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think that I can answer it in this way: Captain Corbin would have been retired as a rear-admiral in the regular order of promotion before the passage of the law of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. LOGAN. There were twenty-five commodores above him, and those twenty-five commodores are not retired to-day as rear-admirals. They have not been promoted as rear-admirals. Please explain to me how this man would have become a rear-admiral with twenty-five commodores between him and the rear-admirals and when a number of these commodores are to-day on the active-list?

Any Senator who understands the rule it seems to me would certainly know at a glance that this man would not have been retired as a rear-admiral; he could not have been promoted to be a rear-admiral by this time. Quite a number of commodores, as I have stated, were before him on the active-list to be promoted as rear-admiral. He was behind that whole list. The Senator says he would have been rear-admiral. Will he please tell me how? Not by any law or in accordance with any rule. Unless Congress would have taken upon itself to have jumped him over all the commodores he could not by any possibility have been a rear-admiral. That is true, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the Senator have an opportunity to finish his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent that the Senator from Illinois be allowed to proceed with his remarks?

Mr. LOGAN. If there is no objection I will take but a moment longer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOGAN. This character of legislation is vicious. It is well known here that at almost every session of Congress bills have been presented to retire Army officers and Navy officers with a rank that they never held and never could have held, some of them belonging to Departments of the Government or at the headquarters of the Army, where the law did not recognize the rank that they asked to be retired upon. So we find in the Army and in the Navy this character of legislation which is unwise in my judgment and inconsistent with the rule laid down for promotion in the Army and the Navy.

Now, look at the retired-list of the Navy. You have more rear-admirals on the retired-list to-day than ever belonged to the Navy. How? By just such legislation as this, by Congress retiring men as rear-admirals when they had never attained the rank, and perhaps never would have attained the rank, if they had remained on the active-list.

Now I ask why this is? The Senator says this man did his duty well. Nobody questions that. Officers in the Army and Navy both have performed their duties well. Is that any reason why they should be jumped over other officers who perform their duties well? Is that any reason why they should be retired on extravagant salaries when other officers of equal merit receive no such recognition from Congress? If you retire this man as a rear-admiral when his rank was only that of captain because he performed his duty well, will not every captain in the Navy have the same argument in his behalf to retire him as a rear-admiral because he performed his duty well?

Sir, that is not a correct rule. The rule as established by law should be obeyed and it should be recognized by Congress. When Congress enacts a law, Congress ought to at least obey its own law if it requires other people to do so. This captain in the Navy refused to go before a retiring board, he refused to appear before the President, he refused to come forward and answer questions that might be propounded to him, and having refused to do that, he was retired, and now he comes to Congress and says, "I want you to recognize in me the right to defy the board that the law created for the purpose of making an examination of myself and others if we desire to go on the retired-list." Sir, I do not think it is right; I do not think it is fair. Congress has jumped men heretofore over fifteen numbers in the Navy by an act of this kind, contrary to every principle and every rule that would be held as a fair criterion by which men should be judged in the Navy and the Army. Men have been jumped merely because they went off and performed a duty they were never required to perform as Navy officers, "for meritorious conduct," jumping other officers who performed their duties gallantly and well. As I said, this character of legislation is not correct; and it leads to ill-feeling in the Navy and in the Army, and only makes the Congress of the United States a foot-ball to be played with by these gentlemen when they feel that they ought to have higher rank when placed on the retired-list.

Take the Army. Men are placed on the retired-list as captains; they come by the dozen, and ask you to promote them on the retired-list to major and to colonel, and men who have been retired with the rank of colonel or major have asked Congress to retire them afterward with the rank of brigadier-general. Over and again this has been attempted to be done, and it has been done, too, by act of Congress, and the same acts of Congress had to be repealed because they created dissensions and ill-feeling in the Army. So it is in the Navy.

I hope this bill will not pass. If it does, there is no reason why every other captain who performed his duty should not be retired as a rear-admiral and placed upon pay as high as a Senator or Member of Congress gets, when he never expected to attain that rank really. There is not one in a hundred who ever expects when he goes into the service of the United States Navy to attain the rank of a rear-admiral, or in the Army to attain the rank of a brigadier-general; but when men come to be retired they ask Congress to give them that rank and give them pay they never received while on the active-list and while performing the duties which they say were so meritorious and so beneficial to the Government.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I think that there is enough in this report to prevent the Senate from granting the relief that is here asked for in any possible event. Certainly no matter what the state of the law might have been, there could have been no question about the authority of the Secretary of the Navy, by reason of his position as commander-in-chief of the Navy, under the President, to have required this person to go before a board or a dozen boards to submit to an examination touching his proficiency. I think that is one of those things he would have a right to require of any officer at any time. His responsibility for the conduct of the officers, his right to know the qualifications, would certainly entitle him to bring the officer before the board or to make any inquiry or any ordinary requisition touching the qualifications of the officer for any purpose.

He might do it for the purpose of assignment, present or prospective, for the purpose of determining whether he should have sea duty or shore duty, or any other service which might legitimately be in his mind in reference to the qualifications, actual or relative, of the officers under his command. This officer was guilty not only of one act of insubordination, but of three. Being before the board under the order of the Secretary, he refused to submit himself to any examination touching his qualifications for the advanced grade which he was seeking to be promoted to. Having thus refused, on reconsideration of the matter the board, acting under the inspection of the Secretary, notified him that he might come again before the board for the purpose of being examined, and he declined again to submit himself to the jurisdiction of the board and the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Navy for the purpose of having his qualifications tested. Then after that he refused to obey the order of the President of the United States to the same purpose and effect.

These three acts of insubordination would under any ordinary state of case have been sufficient to have dismissed him from the Navy; and yet in place of being dismissed he is still in the Navy, and we are asked now, according to the language of a former member of this body, to decorate him for that insubordination. I think that of itself would be enough; but in addition to that we are asked now to make up to this man something which by some misfortune it is supposed he has failed to get. Are we to establish equality, to relieve against the ordinary misfortunes of humanity in behalf of this favored class of people, favored in the matter of salaries, favored in the matter of education, favored in the matter of exemption from the ordinary misfortunes of life? Are we to act in favor of this favored class by exempting them from all those things which are common to humanity, and simply say that there shall be absolute equality everywhere? No matter what accident overtakes a man, no matter whether misfortunes of any kind which are common to everybody happen to him, is the law to step in and relieve him from the consequences?

These people have enough already. They have higher rank than the Army has and higher pay than the Army has. And there is another thing as a matter of public policy which ought to be mentioned here. We are considering the naval appropriation bill. Groaning as the Government is under the exorbitant expenses necessary to keep up the Navy, that is to say the mere personnel of the Navy, the mere shell of a navy, and hesitating whether we shall embark in the expenditure necessary to have a navy because the expenditure which we are already incurring is very largely unnecessary and certainly almost useless, is so much of a burden already that we do not think we can take on the additional sum necessary to have a navy in point of fact; and yet here we go on session after session, Congress after Congress, piling up these expenditures and making it more and more impossible that we ever shall have a navy every time we do it, because every time we do that we increase the ordinary budget of the Navy, and then we stand back aghast to see it is so much, and say we can not give more. Then what do we have? We simply have the officers of the Navy with a few scattered seamen here and there, a few idle navy-yards, $15,000,000 of expenditure, and an establishment at home and abroad which is an object of ridicule and derision everywhere.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON in the chair). The time of the Senator from Kansas has expired. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, Captain Corbin was entitled to promotion had he been qualified for the position. Under the law he had to be examined. He appeared before the examining board. He was required by that examining board to undergo an oral examination. This was in 1873. He declined, on the ground that the board had no power to examine him orally. The question was submitted to the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Navy said he should submit to the examination. Captain Corbin appealed from that decision to the President. The question was submitted to the President, and the President said he should submit to that examination. He defiantly said the law did not permit or authorize the board to make the examination. He defied the orders of the board, of the Secretary of the Navy, and of the President; and now he comes in here and claims that all that proceeding was illegal on the part of the board, the Secretary, and the President. He had his legal remedy. If that board and that Secretary of the Navy transcended their powers, he had the right to go to the courts and by mandamus compel them to proceed according to law. No, sir; Captain Corbin was afraid to go into the courts. It is the same old song we hear from year to year that officers of the Army and the Navy have been deprived of their legal rights and they want Congress to restore them, and they are afraid to go to the courts. We have forced them recently to go to the courts, and the Court of Claims has just decided adversely against a large class of claims for increased salaries.

Mr. President, Captain Corbin had his legal remedy. He could have compelled that board if they were proceeding against law to have proceeded according to law; but he was afraid of the decision of the courts and he violated the orders and requirements of the President and was retired, the only alternative left under the law. It was not a technical retirement, as the Senator from New Jersey says. It was a legal retirement, a retirement in accordance with law and the requirements of law.

Mr. President, read the law quoted in this report, and read the statutes upon the book to-day, and the Naval Committee, I say, have misinterpreted the law. I boldly say it. I boldly say that the interpretation given to the old statute and the statutes now on the books is not right.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. As I shall not have an opportunity of answering the Senator under the rules, not being allowed to speak again, I wish simply to submit this question: Mr. Fox, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, who drafted the act about which the Senator is speaking, gives his interpretation of it and the Department's interpretation during the whole period of time previous to Captain Corbin's application.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is Mr. Fox the law officer of the Department? I thought the Attorney-General was to construe the law for the guidance of the heads of Departments. There is nothing in Mr. Fox's opinion at all. It is not a legal opinion, and does not rise to the dignity of it. I say under the law as it stands to-day, and under the law as it stood then, the board had the right to require this officer to submit to an oral examination, and if he refused there was but one alternative, and that was to retire him. Now, after having slept for eleven years upon his legal right to this promotion, which he could have compelled under the law if he had it, he comes to Congress and wants us to put him in a position that, in the possibility of the flight of imagination he might have attained if he had been kept on the active-list, to give him from 1873 to the present time shore-pay—yes, line his pockets with the taxes wrung from the laboring people of the country—to rob under color of law the tax-payers of the United States. I move to indefinitely postpone the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves to indefinitely postpone the pending bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND (when Mr. WALKER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALKER] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KENNA. My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 16; as follows:

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I hope the Senator will allow the Senate to proceed with the Calendar until 2 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. Last night when the Senate adjourned the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] gave way for an executive session on my stating that at the close of the routine morning business to-day I would seek to bring up the bill, as he wishes to complete his speech, having to go away soon. So in accordance with that arrangement I make the motion now.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. VEST. Nothing is heard more frequently and nothing is more true than the statement that our merchant marine has almost disappeared from the ocean.

Pamphlets, editorials, orations, bewildering in statistics and gorgeous in rhetoric, have alike proved unavailing to stop the decline of American shipping. I have before me now a pamphlet entitled History of American Shipping. Upon its outside cover is a lachrymose picture of Columbia as a galley slave, her "zone-encircled waist" having the inscription "American shipping," her hands chained behind her back, but carrying the suggestive motto of "Bounties to competitors," while around her neck is the blood-curdling placard of "Booty, foreign agents, and lobbyists."

In the dismal background is an American ship-yard marked "Closed" and "For sale," while scattered all around are the broken fragments of agricultural and mechanical implements, supplemented by our national banner trailing in the mud, a mute but eloquent witness to our national disgrace. This pamphlet is from the facile pen of a gentleman formerly in one of the Departments here, who prepared the patriotic addresses delivered at each recurring session by Mr. John Roach before the Committee on Commerce, in which the web and woof of the discourse was "British gold," "Bounties to American ship-builders," "No free ships."

This fact is mentioned to prepare the reader for a ghastly likeness of Mr. Roach on the inside of the pamphlet, with the words, "The most abused yet the best friend of American labor and American shipping in the United States." But in the one hundred and thirty-six pages which follow, and which we are told are only the advance sheets, we are sorry not to find any attempt even to explain the fact that Mr. Roach has in all these years waxed fat and grown richer, while our merchant marine has steadily grown leaner and poorer, until it is now in the jaws of death.

DECLINE.

The decline of American shipping began in 1855. In that year our exports and imports amounted to $536,625,366, of which 85.6 per cent. was carried in American vessels and 14.4 per cent. in foreign vessels. In 1882 our exports and imports amounted to $1,567,071,700, of which 15.5 per cent. was carried in American vessels and 84.5 per cent. in those of foreigners. In other words, while our commerce was three times greater in 1882 than in 1855, our carrying trade had fallen off four-fifths.

What is the disease which has produced this fearful result and what the remedy?

That the civil war did not cause this decline is evident from the fact that it began really six years before the war. Of the loss of American shipping since 1840 up to 1882, 16.4 per cent. was before the war, 38.8 per cent. during the war, and 12.2 per cent. since its close.

That the evils and defects sought to be remedied in the bill from the Commerce Committee did not cause this decline is evident from the fact that we had these same evils and defects upon our statutes prior to 1855, and when our merchant marine was second only to that of Great Britain.

In fifteen years, from 1840 to 1855, our tonnage in the foreign trade increased from 762,838 to 2,378,358 tons; and yet during all these years of increase, and when our fast clipper-ships almost dominated the ocean, we had the same laws as now in regard to three months' extra wages, transportation of disabled sailors, advance wages, officers of American vessels, liability of ship-owners, hospital-tax, tonnage-tax, consular fees, and rebate on ship materials.

To assume that the measure reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will, by remedying the present maritime system of the United States as to all these minor details in sailing a ship, remove the deadly blight upon our merchant marine, is equivalent to the empiricism that mistakes some cutaneous eruption for the organic disease which is sapping the life of a patient, and seeks with cuticura and moderate doses of sulphur to bring back health and vitality.

The proposed amendments to our statute law are well enough, but they should be accompanied by a remedy reaching the seat of the disease, and without which they are ineffectual. It is astonishing what ingenuity is displayed in certain quarters to invent some plausible excuse for evading the real trouble in our maritime system.

But a few years since it was fashionable to ascribe the decline of American shipping to our vicious monetary condition, and thunders of applause greeted certain astute statesmen who declared that depreciated paper money caused our ships to rot at their wharves and the grass to grow in our ship-yards.

Resumption of specie payment came, and our paper money is even better than gold, but the merchant marine is still declining. "None are so blind as those who do not wish to see."

BOUNTIES.

Time has effectually answered the absurd pretext that a depreciated currency destroyed American shipping, and time will also demonstrate the utter inadequacy of the bill before the Senate to remove the real disease.

The same school of statesmen and ship-builders who clung as long as they could to the fallacy of depreciated paper money being the malady now vociferate just as loudly for bounties to American ship builders and owners. This, after all, is the panacea, the pool of Bethesda, which will bring back to life our dying merchant marine.

Nothing is heard so often and so loudly from Mr. Roach and his followers as the assertion that England has obtained her supremacy on the ocean by a system of postal bounties lavishly expended upon lines of steamships to all parts of the world.

Even Mr. Blaine, when a member of this body, declared in the Forty-sixth Congress that in forty years Great Britain had paid $200,000,000 in subsidies to different lines of steamships, and in one instance had given to the Peninsular and Oriental Company $500,000 in order to enable that corporation to dominate the Mediterranean. Coming from so high a source, it is not to be wondered at that all the pamphleteers and penny-a-liners of the Roach school have taken up the cry and have repeated and varied this statement until it is accepted as true by the general public. The impression created by Mr. Blaine and by his imitators is that Great Britain has given so much money as naked subsidies or as inducements to her citizens to run steamship lines when they would not otherwise find it profitable to venture. That Great Britain has paid liberally for ocean mail service is certainly true, and her vast colonial system has made this outlay absolutely necessary, but she has never given sums of money out of hand and as naked subsidies, as is charged by the subsidy advocates of the United States.

The rule adopted by the English Government has always been to advertise all her ocean mail service to the lowest bidder, and to admit the world to become bidders. A striking instance of this is found in the history of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, to which Mr. Blaine referred.

In his History of Merchant Shipping Mr. Lindsay (W. S.) says that in 1837, after loud complaints had been made by the public of the defective mail service from London to Cadiz and Gibraltar, the government invited the Peninsular Company to submit plans for carrying these mails. The plans were submitted, but the government then informed the company that the service would be put up to the lowest bidder, and after advertisement this was done, resulting in the contract being awarded to another company. After a short time this company failed and the service was again advertised, and was awarded to the Peninsular Company, but only on condition that their bid should be reduced from £29,600 to £20,500.

This occurred in 1837, when ocean steam navigation was yet an experiment and regarded with distrust by many of the most experienced navigators and ship-builders.

Mr. Blaine also cited the Cunard line as a glaring instance of naked subsidy by Great Britain in order to build up her merchant marine.

In 1838 the Cunard line was awarded the contract for carrying the North American mails by steamers as the lowest bidder after public advertisement. The first contract was for £55,000 per annum and two voyages per month. Afterward the admiralty required four vessels and the pay was increased to £81,000 per annum.

The contracts required the vessels to be built under the direction of the Government and to carry British naval officers and to be subject to the order of the government in time of war.

Complaint was made by other lines that the contract was an unfair one, and an examination was had by a committee of the House of Commons, whose report showed that the contract was a fair one and the most advantageous to the government that could be made.

Speaking of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, Mr. Lindsay says:

The impression that this company owed its origin to government grants, and that it has been entirely maintained by subsidies for the conveyance of mails, is not supported by facts. Indeed, during the earlier portion of its career, the company by agreeing to carry the Peninsular mails, shortly after it had been started, for a sum considerably less than the cost of maintaining the admiralty packets then employed, with a speed, too, and regularity previously unknown, conferred an undoubted boon on the public.

When Mr. Lindsay uses the word "subsidy" it is not in the American acceptation of bounty, or a premium to do something which otherwise would not be profitable, but as the term is always used in England, meaning simply pay for postal or other government service.

If the assumption of the Roach school be correct, that subsidy has given England her supremacy, and that the same remedy should be applied to the American marine in its present emaciated and wretched condition, then from 1838, when England applied the stimulus of subsidy, she ought to have outstripped the United States, which was then relying only upon the native pluck and enterprise of her people. Now, what are the facts?

In 1837, as we have seen, England fairly entered upon the system of large postal pay to her steamship lines. For the next ten years the struggle was sharp and determined between Great Britain and the United States for supremacy upon the ocean, and in no single decade of our history have the results been more satisfactory to American skill and enterprise.

1833 TO 1840.

Our commerce had grown in 1836 to $480,000,000, doubling itself in twenty years. Our tonnage increased in still larger proportion. In 1840 it was over 2,500,000 tons. We had also sold over 400,000 tons of shipping abroad, by this means bringing to the country $25,000,000 in gold, 90 per cent. of which was paid to American labor. Of our carrying trade at this period it has been well said "that its vast profits laid the foundation of the wealth of the country and built up its merchant marine with a rapidity unequaled in the history of the world."

By 1840, England's statesmen were alive to the danger of her position.

* * * * * * * * *

Despite all these efforts they saw that the United States had already grown to be the second carrying nation of the world, had the raw material, mechanical skill, and energy to spare, and promised to become the first.

Again Mr. Roach says:

In 1850 we had a tonnage of 3,335,454, an increase of over 200 per cent. since 1815. Our coasting trade, from which foreign ships were excluded, employed 1,900,000 tons of shipping, an increase of nearly 400 per cent. in the same period.

All this while England was paying $4,000,000 a year to her fast steamships, which were intended to drive our clippers from the sea.

During all these years of glory and prosperity to the American merchant marine, and comparative disaster and decline of British shipping, when, as Mr. Roach tells us, England saw the "scepter of the seas departing from her," Great Britain was subsidizing her steamship lines, and the United States was paying almost nothing.

In 1848 the United States paid in bounty to vessels sailing under the American flag $100,500, and England paid for ocean postal service the same year $3,250,000. In 1849 the United States paid $235,086, and England $3,180,000. In 1850 the United States paid $619,924, and England $5,315,985. In 1851 the United States paid $1,465,818, and England $5,330,000. In 1852 the United States paid $1,655,240, and England $5,510,635, and so on in about the same proportion to 1858.

These facts show conclusively that "subsidy," as Mr. Roach terms it, is not the cause of England's maritime supremacy, and what is more pertinent to the present discussion, nor was the want of it the cause of our decline upon the ocean.

In 1851 the foreign steamship tonnage of the two countries was nearly equal, that of England being 65,900 tons, and of the United States 62,300; yet in the same year England paid for postal service $5,330,000, and the United States $1,465,818.

It is proper, however, to state in this connection that the sums named as having been paid by Great Britain for postal service are the gross amounts, without deducting repayments from her colonies and from other countries where letters are in part carried by the English mails. The repayments usually amount to two-thirds of the gross sum charged under the head of British postal expenditures, as will be seen, for example, in the fact that in 1872 Great Britain paid in gross £984,625 to steamship companies for packet service; but of this amount £210,839 was repaid by the colonies, and £442,095 by other countries, leaving £332,700 as the net payment by the government that year for purely British postage.

During the period from 1838 to 1855, when we steadily gained upon England in the contest for maritime supremacy, subsidy did not help England or the want of it retard us.

Up to January 1, 1850, both countries had substantially the same navigation laws and the ocean-carrying trade was in wooden vessels. A few iron steamships had been constructed between 1836 and 1850, but the prejudice against them was so strong that they were scarcely known as a factor in commerce. If, then, subsidy, either outright or as postal pay, be the remedy it is proclaimed, why did it not advance the ocean trade of England and the want of it retard that of the United States under the same navigation laws in both countries and with ships of the same material?

The pretense that subsidies or increased pay for ocean mail service will of themselves arrest the decline of our foreign shipping is about as ridiculous and false as the cry that British gold and British influence are working to bring about the repeal of our navigation laws, as if our worst enemy could want any more rapid decline of our foreign shipping than is now going on under the present system.

Bounties or subsidies to induce our people to make investments in a business which they otherwise would avoid are wrong in principle and ruinous in practice. The Government has no constitutional right to subsidize out of the common Treasury any one business or calling, and the only result of such legislation is to temporarily and abnormally stimulate the subsidized interest at the expense of all legitimate business competition.

Mr. Roach says that he does not want subsidies, but only increased postal pay. Yet he repudiates the idea of allowing the mails to be carried by American contractors in any but American-built vessels, and refuses to adopt the English system, which permits the whole world to bid for ocean postal service.

In the work of Mr. Lindsay on merchant shipping, to which I have referred, he says:

> And as a further proof that postal subsidies are not granted with the object of giving to English shippers any protection against the competition of the shipping of other countries, it may be mentioned that when a contract for the conveyance of mails is advertised no restriction whatever is imposed upon any foreign vessels competing; and the subsidy would be paid to foreign-owned and foreign-built vessels if it were considered that the best and cheapest conveyance of mails would then be secured.

If Mr. Roach really believes that the system of subsidies adopted by England has done more than anything else to build up the merchant marine, and that we should adopt the same remedy, then to be consistent he should take the whole of the English system and not a part. He should, as England has done, fling the doors wide open to the whole world, and give the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, no matter of what country or nationality. But when testifying before the shipping committee in New York, and urging postal subsidies as a certain cure for the decay of our merchant marine, Mr. Roach was asked whether he was willing to allow the mails to be carried by any but American-built ships, and he promptly answered in the negative.

For myself, Mr. President, I am willing to vote for adequate and liberal payment for ocean mail service, in lieu of the present unjust and niggardly system; but I want the contractor who receives the award as the lowest bidder to have the privilege of carrying the mails in ships bought in the cheapest market, and not that he shall be forced to buy of Mr. Roach, at an increased cost of 15 or 20 per cent.

If we are to have the English remedy, then let us have it complete, and not that part of it only which suits the purposes of three American ship-builders, at the expense of the entire shipping interest of the United States.

If additional evidence is needed to show that subsidies will not build up the merchant marine, it can be found in the history of French shipping.

On page 113 of the report of the joint committee on shipping will be found a table showing that France has bound herself by contracts made in 1854, 1861, and in 1865 to pay to various steamship lines for mail transportation the annual sum of $4,677,778. Notwithstanding this, France found that she was fast dropping behind in the race for commercial supremacy, and so, in January, 1881, a law was enacted by the French Assembly giving large premiums upon both the construction and sailing of vessels under the French flag.

In 1850 the French tonnage amounted to 688,153 tons; in 1870 it had increased to 1,072,048 tons, but in the next decade it fell off to 919,298 tons.

In his work on Our Merchant Marine Mr. David A. Wells says, in regard to the new system of French bounties:

> The results of the first year's experience of the French system, so far as reported, have not proved satisfactory. Bounties were granted for the encouragement of voyages between French ports, the French colonies, and countries out of Europe; but the returns for 1881 show a very marked decrease in the French tonnage engaged in her colonial trade as compared with 1880, when there were no bounties; while the French tonnage entries into French ports from foreign countries showed a decrease in 1881 as compared with 1880, with some marked gain in the same time in regard to clearances.
> But what is most noticeable is that the entries and clearances of foreign tonnage (which of course receives no bounty) into French ports during 1881 showed a very large increase as compared with 1880, and was apparently in no way affected by the new and discriminating privileges extended French shipping in order to enable it to successfully compete for foreign business.

We must not look, then, to bounties or subsidies for the remedy which can resuscitate our languishing merchant marine. Liberal compensation for carrying the ocean mails is demanded alike by justice and national honor, but when it becomes a bounty pure and simple it is wrong in principle and injurious in practice.

IRON SHIPS.

In considering the causes which have brought our merchant marine to its present condition we can not ignore the fact that iron steamships have revolutionized the carrying trade of the world. Up to 1855 and even to 1860 the United States competed successfully with Great Britain upon the ocean. Our fast wooden clipper-ships carried the American flag upon every sea and to every port. England had in vain attempted to build wooden ships of equal speed and beauty. Mr. Lindsay, an Englishman devoted to his country, admits this fully, and in these words:

> I have already shown that this superiority consisted mainly in the fact that American ships can sail faster and carry more cargo in proportion to their registered tonnage than those of their competitors, but their improvements did not rest here. In considering the current expenses of a merchantman manual labor is one of the most important items, and herein our competitors, by means of improved blocks and various other mechanical appliances, so materially reduced the number of hands, that twenty seamen in an American sailing ship could do as much work, probably with more ease to themselves, than thirty in a British vessel of similar size. With such ships we failed successfully to compete, and although we have since far surpassed them in ocean steam navigation, the Americans were the first to dispatch a steamer for trading purposes across the Atlantic.

That is absolutely a historical fact. As early as 1839 Captain Stockton, of the United States Navy, ordered a small iron screw steamer from Ericsson and sent her to America. This, however, was only an experiment, and iron-ship building was sporadic and of no importance until 1850. The idea of iron floating seemed absurd, and it was objected that compasses on such vessels would be unreliable, that salt water would corrode the iron, and that the building material would be destroyed by oxidation. In 1843 the iron propeller Great Britain was launched, carrying 2,984 tons, and with engines of 1,000 horse-power. It was not, however, until about 1850 that the iron steamship became an important and established factor in British commerce. From that time to this iron and steel have surely asserted their superiority to wood in the construction of ocean steamships, until now it is a fact beyond question that the nation which expects the first rank in commerce must use vessels made of iron or steel and propelled by steam.

In durability, safety, strength, increased tonnage, economy, less insurance, comfort, and health wooden vessels must take the lower place. This being a fact conceded by every intelligent man, how are we to obtain these iron or steel steamships? We have seen that American enterprise and energy overmatched Great Britain so long as the commerce of the world was carried in wooden ships, and the same energy and enterprise must be again taxed to meet the changed conditions which now control the ocean.

That we are not able to build iron or steel steamships as cheaply as Great Britain is established beyond a doubt. The witnesses differ as to the amount, some placing it as high as 30 per cent. and others as low as 10 per cent., but that the cost of constructing such vessels is greater in the United States than in Great Britain can not be questioned. Whether the difference in cost be the greater or less per cent., so long as it exists we can not expect Americans from mere sentiment to build these ships in American ship-yards.

It is useless to say that after the vessel is once built the important question is as to the expense of sailing. No intelligent man will as a rule enter into a business where there is great competition when he is handicapped from the beginning with greater cost for the instrumentalities necessary to that business than is paid for the same articles by his competitors. It may be that for a single venture and under exceptional conditions such a course might be taken, but as a rule nothing of the kind can be expected.

I know that Mr. Roach systematically denies that iron-ship building is not increasing in the United States, but when confronted with the official figures from the Register of the Treasury, as he was before the Joint Shipping Committee, he contents himself by saying that there must be some mistake in the table.

The following is the exhibit, officially, of the construction of iron sailing and steam vessels in the United States from 1868 to 1883, inclusive:

Tonnage of iron sailing and steam vessels built in the United States from 1868 to 1883, inclusive.

[From statements prepared by the Register of the Treasury.]

| Year ended June 30— | Sailing vessels. | Steam vessels. | Total. |
|---|---|---|---|
| | Tons. | Tons. | Tons. |
| 1868 | | 2,801 | 2,801 |
| 1869 | 1,039 | 3,545 | 4,584 |
| 1870 | 679 | 7,602 | 8,281 |
| 1871 | 2,067 | 13,412 | 15,479 |
| 1872 | | 12,766 | 12,766 |
| 1873 | | 26,548 | 26,548 |
| 1874 | | 33,097 | 33,097 |
| 1875 | | 21,632 | 21,632 |
| 1876 | | 21,346 | 21,346 |
| 1877 | | 5,927 | 5,927 |
| 1878 | | 26,960 | 26,960 |
| 1879 | | 22,008 | 22,008 |
| 1880 | 44 | 25,538 | 25,582 |
| 1881 | 36 | 28,320 | 28,356 |
| 1882 | 43 | 40,097 | 40,140 |
| 1883 | 2,033 | 37,613 | 39,646 |

It will be seen from this table that the tonnage of iron steam vessels built in the United States in 1874 was 33,097 tons, and in 1881 it was 28,320, a falling off of 4,777 tons in seven years. In 1882 it was 40,097 tons, and in 1883 37,613 tons, a falling off of 2,484 tons in one year. And yet we are told, as each recurring year brings us nearer to dissolution, that the patient is showing symptoms of renewed vitality and must certainly recover.

Nothing like it has ever been known since the Scotchman's experiment to ascertain if his mare could live on nothing, and when she reached a single straw death unfortunately interfered and prevented a solution of the problem.

I commend to Mr. Roach the following from the annual report on foreign commerce for 1883:

THE DECADENCE OF AMERICAN SHIPPING EMPLOYED IN FOREIGN COMMERCE.

In our commerce with foreign countries there is still a very large preponderance of foreign vessels employed. The tonnage of American vessels entered at seaports of the United States from foreign countries amounted to 2,834,681 tons during the last fiscal year, as against 2,968,290 tons during the previous fiscal year; and the tonnage of foreign vessels entered at seaports of the United States amounted to 10,526,176 tons, as against 11,688,209 tons during the preceding fiscal year.

In 1856 the tonnage of American vessels entered at our seaports from foreign countries amounted to 3,194,275 tons and constituted 71¼ per cent. of the total tonnage entered, and in 1868, three years after the termination of the war, the tonnage of American vessels entered amounted to 2,465,695 tons and constituted 44.26 per cent. of the total tonnage entered, but of the total tonnage entered at seaports of the United States from foreign countries during the last fiscal year 79 per cent. consisted of foreign tonnage and only 21 per cent. of American tonnage.

The amount of American tonnage entered has exhibited but little change since 1868, but the tonnage of foreign vessels entered has increased from 3,105,826 tons in 1868 to 10,526,176 in 1883. In other words, foreign ship-owners have been able to secure the entire increase in our foreign carrying trade, which increase has been very large. These facts show that the decadence of American shipping is not at the present time due to incidents of the late war, but to causes which are persistent. These have been treated of somewhat at length in previous reports, and therefore it does not appear to be necessary to enlarge upon the subject at the present time.

The iron ship, especially the iron steamer, has become the most efficient vehicle of international commerce upon the ocean, to a great extent superseding the wooden ship. During the last fiscal year the tonnage of iron sailing vessels built in this country amounted to only 2,033 tons, and that of iron steam vessels to 37,613 tons, a total iron tonnage built of 39,646 tons, as against 40,097 tons built during the preceding fiscal year. How small, relatively, is the iron tonnage built in the United States is shown by the fact that during the year 1882 there were 130 iron and steel sailing vessels built in Great Britain and Ireland, the total tonnage of which was 132,340 tons, and 568 iron and steel steam vessels built, the total tonnage of which was 520,437 tons; a total of 698 iron and steel sailing and steam vessels, the aggregate tonnage of which was 652,777 tons, or sixteen and a half times the total iron tonnage built in the United States.

The small progress which we have made in the building of iron and steel vessels is even more strikingly exhibited by the fact that of the 39,646 tons built in the United States during the year ended June 30, 1883, 18,530 tons were for the home trade, which under our navigation laws is confined exclusively to American vessels, and only 21,116 tons for the foreign trade, which under the principles of maritime reciprocity now prevalent among commercial nations is free to the ships of all nations.

COST OF BUILDING IRON SHIPS.

As I have said before, the evidence varies as to the amount of difference between the cost of iron ships in this country and Great Britain, but all agree that we are unable to construct them as cheaply. The difference in cost varies from 10 or 12 to 30 or 40 per cent., and is dependent upon the class to which the vessel belongs.

In order to arrive at the truth in regard to the difference in cost between the construction of an iron steamship in Great Britain and the United States I addressed a letter to the superintendent of the American Steamship Company, a gentleman of high standing in the city of Philadelphia, and well known to the Senators from Pennsylvania and New Jersey, Mr. C. A. Griscom, and I specifically called his attention to the question of the difference of cost, because there had been great variety of testimony given before us in New York on that subject. Here is his reply:

COST OF BUILDING.

It is very difficult to compare exactly the relative cost of building in this country and abroad, because a steamship is as varying an article as a house; and you will appreciate that to broadly say one can build a house in New York cheaper than in Saint Louis does not convey any intelligent idea to the inquirer. The Red Star line, however, has on different occasions within the past five years tested this question of first cost quite as accurately perhaps as has been possible, and on each of those occasions we found that the class of steamers we contemplated building, namely, of large size, high power, completely fitted for one hundred to one hundred and fifty cabin passengers, would cost about 10 to 12 per cent. more in this country than if built by the best builders in Great Britain. But I should perhaps explain that if our inquiry had been for a freighting steamer only, or for a steamer with very moderate cabin accommodations, the difference in cost against building in this country would have been very much greater.

In other words, to the extent that extensive joiner-work becomes a part of the structure, to that extent is the American cost relatively cheapened; and to the extent that you descend in the scale toward a simple freight carrier, or so-called "ocean tramp," which means merely an iron box with engines to drive it, is the difference against building in this country largely increased and reaches as high as 30 or 40 per cent. for the smallest-powered freighter.

As appears from this—and no authority can be higher—the greatest difference in cost is in the construction of freight steamers, and unfortunately for us, this is the class of vessels most important to our merchant marine.

It is to these "iron boxes with engines to drive them," as Mr. Griscom describes them, that we must look for the transportation of our exports and imports; and when we reflect that an Englishman can buy one of these vessels for nearly one-third less than the same vessel can be had by an American it will be seen how terribly we are handicapped in the race for commercial supremacy and how hopeless is the task of inducing our citizens to enter the contest unless this inequality is in some way removed.

It is said by the advocates of our present maritime system, conspicuously by Mr. Blaine, that 90 per cent. of the cost of an iron steamship is in the cost of labor necessary to its construction, and that the high wages of workmen in the United States constitutes the difference in cost between Great Britain and this country.

Those who oppose the present system are then defied to lay their sacrilegious hands upon the wages of American workmen, and the air is heavy with Columbian eloquence about civilization, happy homes, contented firesides, education, and all the elevating influences of high wages, contrasted with the starved and pauper labor of England.

This will do for campaign purposes, but the fact is studiously concealed from the workingmen of America that the protective system which is said to give them these high wages also gives them higher prices for all the necessaries of life and largely enhances the cost of living. While the workingman receives $2 per day, one-half is taken from him by the increase in the cost of living, caused by a high protective tariff.

At the last session of Congress a piece of cloth was exhibited in the Senate by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], which could be bought by the English workman for 15 cents per yard, but under our tariff would cost the American workman 75 cents per yard. Even the labor bureau of Massachusetts estimates the difference in the cost of living at 15 per cent. where the English and American workman live exactly alike, and if this admission comes from that quarter, we can safely assume the per cent. to be much greater.

If the American common laborer receives 30 per cent. more, and the skilled laborer 50 per cent. more, and the cost of living is only 15 per cent. greater in this country, it is most astonishing that England is able to retain any labor at all. And yet we find that while thousands of other nationalities are flocking to our shores, very few English laborers are leaving their native lands, and especially very few skilled mechanics.

The statement that English workmen do not live comfortably and contentedly is best answered by a gentleman who was one of their number, and is now a large manufacturer in the State of Delaware.

His high character is well known to both the Senators from that State, and I make no apology for reading a letter from him on this subject, which was written in answer to certain inquiries propounded by me through one of the Senators from Delaware as to the mode of life and the cost of living among English workmen as compared with that of workmen in the United States.

NEWARK, DEL., January 30, 1883.

Hon. THOMAS F. BAYARD:

MY DEAR SIR: Yours of yesterday at hand. In reply say while in England, in 1881, I took from home many letters of introduction to work-people on the other side and delivered my letters, and then made my home among the work-people, and all with whom I came in contact lived comfortably well, fully equal to what I lived in my American home during the first nine years of my married life, during which time I never received over $6 per week; so now you can see that I am just a little able to judge between the two countries. It might have been that they have done something better than their regular living while I was staying with them, but on my visit through Lancashire, in the cotton manufacturing districts, I called on the parties to whom I had letters without their having any knowledge of my coming, and I will say that I fared very well, and hope no American shall ever get worse. They then will have but little to complain of. I, as a rule, had for my breakfast coffee, bread and butter, fried bacon, and those who eat eggs had them, and in almost all cases there would be oatmeal porridge, with milk or sirup. For dinner, as a rule, I found that on a Sunday a good-sized roast of beef was provided, along with potatoes, turnips, cabbage, and in very many cases a good article of cauliflower. Through the week the beef would be brought to the table and cut cold, and I enjoyed it very much, as it was so different from my late living at home. For tea we had in many cases muffins brought to the table hot, opened and buttered, with tea, bread and butter, and seldom any meat, but frequently oatmeal porridge and milk for those who chose it. I must say I did not in the class of work-people with whom I met find that much-talked-of article, the "pauper laborer of Europe."

You will probably recollect my introducing you to a cousin of mine, a David Constantine, when you was last at my house; he had been but two days in the country at that time. He is an educated, intelligent young man of about 33 years of age, and is now working for me at carpentering, and is a good, industrious workman and entirely reliable. I took Mr. VEST's questions to him where he was at work and got him to quit work and answer to the best of his knowledge. The character of the clothing worn by factory and other work-people for every-day wear in both Lancashire and Yorkshire is what is known in England as fustian; it is both plain or cut. We call it corduroy or velveteen. They have their pants made double out of this strong material, and they cost, made up, in our currency $2.50. Mr. C. says they will last any man two years for working in; this I am satisfied from seeing the article; we get none of that best article over here; a coat and vest of same material for $3.50, and he says they will last a man a lifetime, which I should think is near correct. The article is almost as strong as leather.

He has a suit of very fine woolen goods, which he says he bought over five years since and paid $15. In my judgment such a suit here to-day would cost $30. When I was over in 1881 I found the woolen goods to be just about one-half what they are here. And as I showed you a sample of cotton-warp cloth that weighed eighteen ounces per yard of fifty-four inches wide, which the manufacturer said netted him 7½*d.* per yard, you can judge for yourself how cheap they were sold over there. Mr. Constantine has on a pair of shoes which he had made to order, and cost him $3.50. The store shoes sell at about $3, and they last from two to three years with an occasional half-soling. While I was waiting for a train at the Dewsbury Station in Yorkshire in 1881 a workingman took a seat on the bench beside myself. I noticed that he had a new pair of very strong shoes on his feet; it attracted my attention, and so I put the question to him, "What do you pay for a pair of such shoes?" His answer was 16*s.*, or about $4, which struck me as being very high. I then began to inquire how long such a pair would last, and his reply, from three to four years "wi' a bit o' mendin'."

For a good quality broad-brimmed felt hat which Mr. Constantine brought with him he paid 4*s.*, and here it would not cost less than $2. The average rent of a house for a workingman, with a cellar, kitchen, living room, two sleeping rooms overhead, and a finished attic, with range, gas, and water, all free except the gas, which, he says, cost him 3*s.* 6*d.* for a half year—such a house of stone, with garden, would cost 3*s.* 6*d.* per week. The furniture, two tables, one for dining and one for sitting room, from five to six dollars each. Chairs made of oak or maple or some hard wood, with rush or cane bottoms, at $1 each. Mr. Constantine is a cabinet-maker, and says furniture is cheaper in England than here. A very complete iron bedstead can be had from 15*s.* upward to £10 each. They are very complete (and for our hot climate I think a great improvement over our wooden ones). All ranges and cooking apparatus belong to the house, and are included in the rent.

Answer to Mr. VEST's last question: Coffee, bread, bacon, occasionally an egg, with plenty of porridge and milk or molasses (treacle) for breakfast; for dinner, beef or mutton, bread, potatoes, &c. Many use oatmeal porridge and milk for both supper and breakfast. Average cost per week for Mr. Constantine, wife, and one child, to cover all expenses of household character, including rent, &c., a pound sterling per week; and he said out of this amount, which he gave his wife with which to keep house, she saved money, and when he would sometimes be short to pay a journeyman his wages he used to borrow enough to make up the amount from his wife out of her savings.

What I have given you is reliable. It is the imaginary wants of the Americans that make it so difficult to get along. This I know to be a solid fact from my own experience, as I told you in the beginning. I never had but from $4.50 to $6 per week for wages the first nine years of my life, and they were the happiest nine years of my life. I hope this will answer.

Respectfully,

WM. DEAN.

This is the testimony of a plain, sensible, self-made man, and from his own personal experience, yet I know how little it will avail against the clamor of those who are interested in causing the American workman to believe that his greatest benefactor is the high protective system, which pays him with one hand only to rob him with the other.

In an address before the Board of Trade of San Francisco, Mr. Hopkins, a leading merchant of that city, described the operation of the high protective tariff system in these words:

For while the protected domestic market recoups the high cost and guarantees a profit on all protected articles of American manufacture, the cost of building our vessels is raised by the same means, but our market is not likewise protected. On the contrary, our shipping in the foreign trade must compete, without any possible protection from our Government, in the free, open market of the world, which of course hires vessels where it can hire cheapest. If high interest on high cost, high wages, taxes, fees, repairs, &c., make $1,000 per month the cost of running an American ship, while low interest on low cost, low wages, and the absence of taxes, fees, or repairs bring down the cost of running an English ship to $500 per month, who does not perceive that the English vessel will make money where the American owner must soon become bankrupt? Yet this is the actual condition of the shipping business now, and such it has been since the enactment of our present high tariff.

That under these circumstances common justice to our injured class, regard for the national honor abroad, as well as for the national economy which requires the retention in our own country of the enormous freights paid on American exports to other nations, and the national safety in case of foreign war—all these motives justify us in the demand that we should be placed as far as possible in such a position as if there were no tariff; and that such legislation should be promptly enacted as will place American ship-owners on an equality with those of England. Unloose the fetters; remove the weights imposed on us by our ill-fitting and outgrown laws; leave us free, as are the English, to utilize our abundant materials, our energy, and skill, and doubt not American mechanics and sailors will soon again overtake their rivals on the seas.

Every word of this energetic protest is true, and it was not necessary for the speaker to go outside of the city of San Francisco for apt illustration.

Out of five hundred and fifty vessels which left that port in 1882 only twelve were owned by citizens of San Francisco, and for the same period she paid for ocean freight to Europe $16,069,789, and to and from all ports on the Pacific coast $2,000,000, nearly all of which went to foreigners.

Nor does the high protective tariff limit its effect to the cost of labor in the construction of iron steamships. After the vessel is built and afloat its baleful influence follows the American owner and drives him from the ocean.

In the House of Representatives, during the last Congress, Mr. DINGLEY, of Maine, whose name has been given to the bill before the Senate from the Commerce Committee, made the following statement:

Practically with the liberty which a vessel has when it enters a foreign port to ship a new crew, it may be said that, so far as sailing vessels are concerned, that is not an element that enters seriously into the question.

So far as steamships are concerned, which from the very nature of the trade requires a permanent crew, there is some difficulty, but not enough to seriously interfere with the extension of our foreign carrying trade.

Mr. DINGLEY was then discussing the question of seamen's wages, and to show how much he is mistaken in his assertions I will read a letter from Mr. Griscom, of Philadelphia, from which I have already read an extract. I do not agree with all Mr. Griscom's conclusions, but his acknowledged ability, integrity, and experience as the head of the Red Star line must give his opinions great weight:

Hon. G. G. VEST,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

MY DEAR SIR: The American Steamship Company, the stock of which is mostly owned by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, built four iron steamers with the Messrs. Cramp, of this city, between the years of 1871 and 1874, of 3,100 tons gross measurement. They have since been operated under the American flag between this port and Liverpool, enjoying all the influence which the Pennsylvania Railroad, with her innumerable agencies and facilities, possessed.

The traffic grew so rapidly that more steamers were soon required, but the experience of operating them under the American flag, from increased wages and heavy first cost, deterred the American Steamship Company from building any further steamers, and they decided, perforce, to stand still and let the increase of the service be taken up under the British flag; and since that time ten iron and steel steamships of the most improved type have been added and run profitably under the British flag, while the four American boats under precisely the same conditions although they have been run with unparalleled success as to freedom from accident or disaster, have fallen far short of earning the interest on their first cost, and at this moment of writing are on the eve of being withdrawn and laid up or sold for some other trade.

That is a most astounding statement. Here were these steamships, six under the British flag and four under the United States flag, with all the patronage and influence of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company behind them; and yet Mr. Griscom says that the American vessels lost money side by side with those under the British flag, and he will be compelled to either sell them or put them in another trade.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator now will show the Senate how that could be cured by permitting the free purchase of English ships, how the increased cost of running American ships will be changed at all by taking a British ship and putting her under the American flag, for that is the real question undoubtedly on the matter of free ships.

Mr. VEST. I propose to discuss that. I am discussing the question of seamen's wages now, if the Senator will pardon me, and I am proceeding to show by actual demonstration, if human testimony ever demonstrates anything, that your infamous navigation laws create this difference in wages, and, in conjunction with other causes, operate so that the American vessel can not possibly compete with one running under another flag.

Mr. FRYE. In other words, the Senator proposes to devise some plan by which the wages of American seamen will be decreased.

Mr. VEST. I propose that those wages shall be just and equitable. They are not American seamen's wages. The Senator knows that but 5 per cent. of the sailors now upon American ships are Americans. They are foreigners. All this pretext of protecting American seamen is "leather and prunella;" they are not in existence. You have no sailors. Ninety-five per cent. of the sailors now on our ships are foreigners; and under these miserable navigation laws every American vessel is bound to reship her crew when she comes back to American shores, and then the sailors are again picked up, and foreigners are paid the same wages that Americans are paid in the coastwise trade. That is what this letter states, and that is what I was going on to prove. These foreign sailors are generally the refuse of the merchant marine of other countries.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator does not say that is true of the coastwise trade?

Mr. VEST. No, but I speak of wages. These foreigners come here, and when we reship our crews they demand the same wages that are paid in the coastwise trade.

Mr. FRYE. That is true. Under the American flag they will demand higher wages, and go under a foreign flag and take lower wages. Now, does the Senator propose to take the coastwise trade, repeal the navigation laws, and put that in precisely the same field, and have 95 per cent. of the sailors there foreigners?

Mr. VEST. I have not said a word about the coastwise trade except this: The navigation laws which require that every American vessel that comes back from a foreign port must discharge her crew and take another one, create an increase of wages to foreigners, not to American seamen.

Mr. BAYARD. May I interrupt my friend?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. The question is very interesting. At the city of Philadelphia there was a line of steamships called the American line. It was composed of ships built and registered in the United States, and also of ships built and registered in Great Britain. Part of the ships were English ships owned and built, part of the ships were American ships owned and built; and when I say "owned" I mean they were held by the same class of stockholders in the steamboat company.

The other day when the Secretary of the Navy happened to be in Philadelphia he was congratulating them on the fact of having the only American line, and immediately one of the stockholders present rose and said that it might be a cause of congratulation, but the stock was for sale and the American ships would be transferred to British register in the course of three months if some American did not buy them. The same stockholders own the vessels running from the same dock in Liverpool to the dock in Philadelphia, and they were controlled by the same interest. The pay of the captain on the British ship and the pay of the sailor on the British ship was just the same under the rule of that company as the payment of the crew on the American ship, and I have wanted to know what was the magic of a new set of papers for these two sets of vessels that was to change the cost of running them. They were owned by the same people, they traversed the same distance, they carried the same commodities, and the sailors and the officers received the same wages. Every inducement to economy was the same on one ship as it was on the other.

Now the question was, what was to be gained by the change of register? I have sought to discover that. There is no magic in a name any more than changing the name on the stern. The same hull, the same ship, the same men are there; the same dues, the same port charges are paid. What, then, was to be gained? What is there that makes the difference between the operating of an American ship and running her and operating and running a British ship? It is a question of interest to me. I sit on my piazza and see these vessels, the British ship and the American ship, pass up and down that bay, owned by the same people, everything the same except the flag. The captain of the British ship wants his pay; he goes to the office. The American captain goes to the same office and gets the same pay. The dues are the same. What is the advantage of this stockholder selling out and getting a British register instead of the American? What does he gain by that? In truth, he loses one thing, he loses the right that every American vessel has to-day of engaging in the coastwise trade. Put her under a British register and she can not engage in the coastwise trade. So there is an advantage in having the vessel under an American register. And yet we are told by that stockholder, and I take it for granted he followed the law of self-interest, that it was not profitable to him. He told Mr. Chandler, the Secretary of the Navy, that if it was a matter of congratulation to have a line under the American flag, anybody might have the stock.

The point referred to by my friend from Missouri of course we are all anxious to get at, we are all anxious to understand; and he will pardon me for the length of my interruption. I hope we shall come to some conclusion that shall be fruitful of real reform.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Delaware has stated the very point on which I was quoting from Mr. Griscom, with whom I formed a very pleasant acquaintance, and with whom I have had various discussions on this subject. He is superintendent of the company that runs one steamship line from Philadelphia to Liverpool in which there are ten vessels, and one from New York to Antwerp which is called the Red Star line, and for which he receives, as stated in this letter, ocean mail postage from the Belgian Government. The very question the Senator from Delaware has asked I asked Mr. Griscom. And this is his reply:

At the time the Pennsylvania Railroad Company established the American Steamship Company they called upon my firm to try to establish a line to the continent. We succeeded in getting some friends together and organized the International Navigation Company, the proprietors of the Red Star line. The capital required at this time and all the money which has since been raised, exceeding $5,000,000, has been subscribed in this State, with the exception of one-fifteenth, which is owned by our correspondents and representatives in Belgium. Our first impulse, naturally, was to build ships in this country and organize under our own flag. At that moment the difference in first cost, as near as we could test it, was from 25 to 30 per cent.; added to this was the continual increased cost of running. We therefore reluctantly decided that we must build abroad and organize a foreign company to own the steamers. We organized a company in Belgium, and finally, after we had been running a few years, and gained the confidence of the government and the community, we succeeded in obtaining a contract to carry the mails between Antwerp and New York, for which we receive 500,000 francs per annum.

Here you will observe a marked contrast between the way in which the Red Star line, without any particular friends or influence at Brussels, except such as were secured by performing our service well, was received and treated by the Belgian Government, and the way in which the American Steamship Company, organized here in Philadelphia, sustained by local patronage, and an object of great local pride, was treated by our Government. I believe the highest amount ever received by the American Steamship Company for carrying the mails was $2,400 per annum. If it had received only enough assistance to counteract the increased first cost and the subsequent continual higher cost of running, the ten steamers subsequently added to the American line under the British flag would undoubtedly have been added under our own flag.

For your information, I inclose you the sailing lists of the American and Red Star lines, on the outside leaf of which are the steamers engaged in each service at the present time. The first four named on the American line list are the four original boats under the American flag; the remaining five are under the British flag.

WAGES.

I ask attention of Senators to this:

The monthly wages of the four American boats is $3,150. The monthly wages of the boats running alongside of them in the American line is about $1,900, or $15,000 per steamer per annum against our flag.

Mr. FRYE. Now, if the Senator will allow me, that was the question which I asked the Senator from Delaware. The Senator from Delaware stated that the captain, officers, and men received precisely the same pay on the American and the British line.

Mr. VEST. Not the men.

Mr. FRYE. That was what he stated; at least I so understood.

Mr. VEST. I will go on and read this letter, which answers the Senator from Maine and shows where this difference is and corroborates my statement. These foreign sailors are brought here under your navigation laws, and then demand the same wages that are received by American sailors in the coastwise trade; the coastwise trade only competes with Americans, while these vessels in the foreign trade go out upon the ocean and compete with foreign vessels without any protection. I am going on to read what Mr. Griscom says is the reason.

He says the difference in the expense of running is $15,000 per annum on each steamer against the American flag.

On these four boats say $60,000 per annum, or 6 per cent. on $1,000,000 capital. If we had increased under the American flag, and had the five additional boats as now running, the wages alone against us, as compared with competitors under a foreign flag, would have amounted to $134,000 per annum on the nine steamers now running.

A similar comparison with the Red Star boats, in which service we will have ten steamers running this month, would have been in round numbers $150,000 per annum against us if we had organized under the American flag; and inasmuch as the Belgian Government gives us $100,000 per annum for carrying the mails, you will see that we have about $250,000 per annum to tempt us to expatriate ourselves with this enterprise. In other words, if Congress should pass a bill to-morrow admitting foreign-built ships to American registry, the Red Star line could not afford to abandon the flag that now protects it.

At this moment the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is negotiating with the Red Star line to take over and operate the Philadelphia and Liverpool service, now conducted by the American line, and if they do so several million of dollars more of American capital will be compelled to seek a foreign flag, unless Congress applies a proper remedy.

Mr. FRYE. Now will it interrupt the Senator——

Mr. VEST. It is no interrupion.

Mr. FRYE. I should regard it as inexcusable to interrupt the Senator if there was an opportunity to reply on this bill, but there is a shipping bill behind this.

Mr. VEST. I will state to the Senator that it does not interrupt me at all. I am very glad to hear him. I want the truth about this matter. I want to get at what is best to revive our merchant marine. I am glad to be interrupted.

Mr. FRYE. I call the Senator's attention to this: When the question has been presented to the advocates of free ships as to the coastwise trade, which has been protected against foreign competition by the navigation laws, speaking of them technically, by preventing foreign vessels taking any part in the coastwise trade—when that objection has been urged to the advocates of free ships, as a rule the gentlemen reply, "We do not propose that the ships which are purchased abroad shall be permitted to engage in your coastwise trade; we propose still to reserve that to Americans and to American ships and to the American flag." And then when the objection is made, "But your purchased ship will be under an American flag, and will you make a distinction against her because she is purchased abroad?" the reply is, "Yes; we will put a limitation upon the law that a ship so purchased abroad shall not be permitted to engage in the coastwise trade."

Now, I ask the Senator in his statement to distinguish, to have it understood whether or not in his proposition for the purchase of ships abroad he proposes any limitation whatever upon them? If he does propose that limitation, then as a matter of course his argument touching the wages of seamen will be without any force. If on the contrary he proposes to cure this matter of wages by admitting foreign-purchased ships to participate in our coastwise trade, then I desire to know that distinctly.

Mr. VEST. So far as the amendment which I proposed to the bill reported by the Senator from Maine is concerned, that only applies to foreign commerce, not to the coastwise trade. But I am now discussing the question simply of wages. I do not pretend to say that admitting foreign vessels under the American flag would remedy this question of wages at all. I do mean to say that the repeal of that part of our navigation laws which requires an American vessel to discharge her crew when she comes from a foreign voyage and rehire them does make this unjust inequality, and that is just the thing of which Mr. Griscom complains, as I shall proceed to show.

Why is it now that under the law as it exists when an American vessel goes to Liverpool, ships her crew there of English or of Germans or of Italians, and comes back to this country, the very minute she touches the American coast under the law she must discharge all the sailors and rehire them from the boarding-house keepers and shipping commissioners, and then the very men she rehires say, "You must pay us Philadelphia and New York wages in the coastwise trade?"

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator a question to set myself right?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. I stated that which I believed to be true upon information of those who have been connected with the line, that four vessels running on the same line from Philadelphia pay the same salaries to their officers and the same wages to their crews. That I understood to be the case. Now, I understand that Messrs. Wright, who I think are the agents of the line——

Mr. VEST. This letter is from Mr. C. A. Griscom. The Senator knows him?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes; he is a very well-known shipping merchant of Philadelphia.

Mr. VEST. He is the superintendent for Peter Wright & Co.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes; a firm of very high repute. I think they are the proprietors of the Red Star line. They say now that, owning ten ships, five under the American flag and five under the foreign flag, there is between those two a difference of $15,000 a year for the mere expense of wages in the ships. My friend from Missouri suggests that that will be remedied by a change in our shipping laws in regard to the shipment of seamen, so as not to oblige the American ship-owner to discharge his crew at the end, not of every round-trip voyage, but at every terminus of the trip across the Atlantic.

That is certainly a new fact, and it is one that I should feel disposed to question in the line of cause and effect. I can scarcely believe that the difference between $1,900 and $3,000 exists in the wages of two ordinary steamers to and from, when sailing from the same dock to the same dock under the same ownership, with no difference at all between them, food and clothing all the same, except the flag flying over them.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Delaware will see from this letter that Mr. Griscom answers that very question. I would not have undertaken to have made this statement upon my own responsibility. I make it on the responsibility of a member of the firm of Peter Wright & Co., and president of the International Navigation Company.

Mr. BAYARD. A most responsible gentleman.

Mr. VEST. Here is what Mr. Griscom says on this very question.

SHIPPING CREWS.

We can not ship a crew in a foreign port and avail ourselves of the lower rate of wages there, because the Revised Statues make it obligatory upon every vessel under the American flag in the foreign trade to discharge their crews upon arrival at the United States, and on hiring a crew in the United States to contract with them to bring them back to this country, so that on the American steamers where a sailor or any other employé deserts in Liverpool, as frequently happens, we fill the vacancy by a man hired in Liverpool at the Liverpool current wages, and we are compelled by law to pay that man off on arrival here and if we want him again to rehire him. When once in this country it is only possible to rehire men at the current wages in this country, which are the rates prevailing in our coastwise trade, which is a protected trade from foreign competition, and the employés therefore naturally receive the higher scale of wages which it is necessary they should charge in order to maintain and support their families in this country. In other words, the same higher scale of wages prevails for sea-going people that prevails throughout the entire range of skilled labor on the land. Therefore as long as the policy of protection makes the cost of living in this country, and hence the scale of wages, higher than in all other countries, it will be impossible to successfully compete on the ocean against the cheaper labor of all our competitors, even with vessels at as low a cost.

Such legislation as is proposed in the so-called Dingley bill may possibly partially reach this question of hiring seamen, but it can not entirely reach the question, and my conviction is that it is the wrong way to go about it. I think our Government should recognize the conditions which surround our commerce, which are incident to the general policy of the country, and either by mail compensation or by bounties to ship-owners return to them sufficient to cover the higher cost of building and the higher cost of running. I inclose a copy of the bill which has been submitted by the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, which I assisted in preparing, modeled after the French law, which I think is the only thorough and searching way to reach this difficulty. The objection to mail compensation is that it is not open at all, and is liable to be gobbled up by those having the most influence at Washington, irrespective of whether their enterprises are the most deserving or not.

I differ from some of my associates in holding the opinion that besides a bill for establishing bounties for running as described, foreign ships should also be admitted to American registry for a limited term, but the owners thereof should receive a less bounty than allowed upon vessels built in the United States. We should strive to encourage ship-building in this country, but not to so legislate that we may build up a monopoly in that industry, that could, by excessive profits, limit the building and running of vessels, and thus defeat the very object of allowing bounties.

In conclusion, I believe that our Government should—

1. Adopt the French bounty system, or one approximating it.

2. Admit for five years foreign-built vessels for the foreign trade to American registry.

If I have been correctly informed as to the figures, our Government now realizes $1,250,000 per annum from the tonnage-tax and makes a profit out of the postage on foreign mails of about a similar amount. The appropriation annually of a sum equal to those two items would pay bounties on a large fleet.

Such a policy as I have described would in a few years give us a commercial marine second only to Great Britain, and make us independent of the world for marketing our crops and protecting ourselves in time of war.

Yours, truly,

C. A. GRISCOM.

I will frankly state that Mr. Griscom does not agree with me in regard to the remedy. His idea is to give bounties, as the French do, and to admit foreign-built ships to registry for five years. I believe they ought to be admitted at any time that an American citizen sees proper to buy them.

Mr. BAYARD. Does not my friend think it is a very left-hand inducement under these figures to give a vessel an American register?

Mr. VEST. I do not know. That may be so now, but it would not be if our navigation laws are properly amended.

Mr. BAYARD. If she has to pay her crew double I think it would be better to let her stay under foreign registry.

Mr. VEST. But the fact remains, and that is the salient point to which this letter tends, that under our laws now one of these vessels ships her crew in Liverpool; there she pays only the same wages that the Germans pay, that the Italians pay, that the French pay, who ship their crews in Liverpool. Instead of retaining those crews at the same rate and the same wages for the round trip when she touches American soil, our Congress puts its hand on that vessel and says, "Stop! you must discharge those seamen, whether Americans or not; you must rehire them; you must go to the boarding-house keepers, to the shipping commissioner;" and the very minute this is done these people through avarice or greed find out the wages in the coastwise trade, and immediately the foreign sailors say, "You must pay us what is paid to American sailors in the coastwise trade." Now, says the superintendent of this line, that makes a difference of $15,000 a year on each one of these vessels, and on ten vessels it makes a difference of $150,000.

Is it any wonder that these four vessels, the only four we have, are about to leave the flag of their country and go to a foreign flag? Is it any wonder after we hear this statement, in view of this law, that the American merchant marine is now in the very agonies and throes of death?

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator pardon me for one moment?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. It may save me the trouble of arguing the case at all. The Senator has an amendment pending to the shipping bill. Is there anything in that amendment which provides for free ships that will remedy the evil of which the Senator complains and will change the wages?

Mr. VEST. If my friend from Maine will pardon me—of course I want to hear anything he has to say—but I will discuss that hereafter. It is a little out of the line of my argument to allude to it now.

Mr. FRYE. I will not ask the Senator to do it now. My reply to the free-trade argument is that if you could purchase to-day under the laws of the United States ships anywhere in the wide world there is not an American citizen who would dream of making the purchase. Free trade in ships amounts to nothing, because you could not run them in competition with foreign ships on account of the increased cost by reason of the wages. If the Senator does not touch the coastwise trade and repeal any of the navigation laws which protect it, I want him to show before he gets through how he proposes to change those wages by his amendment.

Mr. VEST. I propose to do that. My amendment is only one of the instrumentalities I propose. I have never said, I do not say now, and I never expect to say, that free ships is the only remedy. Free ships is only one of the steps toward bringing back our merchant marine. If we were on top of the hill and on a level with the other maritime nations of the world, then it would be a different question; but we are at the bottom of the hill, and we must commence to learn to crawl like a child, and then to walk, and must take step by step.

If the Senator will do me the honor to listen to the remainder of my argument he will find that I say not only free ships but I take the remedies in the bill which he reported from our Committee on Commerce, and then I would repeal the clause of the navigation laws to which I have alluded in regard to reshipping crews. More than all, I would reform the protective system, which has struck down the merchant marine of the United States as it has struck down a great many other industries of the country.

Mr. FRYE. By increasing the wages of the people.

Mr. VEST. Not increasing the wages of the people, but by bringing everything to an abnormal and fictitious basis. I know the argument that has been made on this as well as every other question that touches the protective tariff. We are met everywhere, in every campaign, particularly in the factories and workshops, with the argument made to American workingmen, "These free-traders or revenue reformers want to take the bread out of the mouths of your wives and children." We want to do no such thing. We simply want to prove to these people, as we can prove, that the tariff does not pay them really higher wages, that it pays them with one hand and robs them with the other, and that the whole of it is nothing but a patent machine by which the impression is made that wages are increased, when in reality it is not the fact. But this is an interlude. I will go on.

I take it, Mr. President, that some time will elapse before the statements in this letter from Mr. Griscom will be answered, except by sneers and evasion, but they show beyond question that our present maritime system is fatally defective, and that without its entire remodeling we must expect to see our flag literally disappear from the ocean. The only four steamships now carrying that flag are, as Mr. Griscom states, about to abandon it, and for this, as his letter shows, we are indebted to those "twin relics of barbarism," the high tariff and the navigation laws.

I have examined briefly the effect of the former, and I come now to the crowning outrage upon our people and commerce, the maritime system, which every other nation has abandoned except the United States.

NAVIGATION LAWS.

Mr. President, it is with the greatest difficulty that I can force myself to speak with patience or moderation of the legislation now upon our statute-books, and known as the navigation laws of the United States. They were enacted for a different era, and, as even their friends assert, in a spirit of retaliation against laws of England which no longer exist. History shows that they were "conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity," and that they are the net result of a bargain between the New England States and South Carolina and Georgia, in which the former agreed that the slave trade, with all the horrors of the middle passage, should be kept open until 1808, provided the navigation laws should secure to New England a monopoly of the ocean carrying trade.

I know that this has been denied and Mr. David A. Wells has been abused without stint for making the assertion, but it is true, and the authorities cited by Mr. Wells put the matter beyond question. The New England States, whose principal interest was shipping, were anxious to have such navigation laws as would secure to them the entire carrying trade of the United States, and South Carolina and Georgia were equally anxious for the continuance of the African slave trade.

The curious part of this history, read in the light of recent events, is that Virginia led in the fight against slavery, while the New England States voted for its continuance, in order to traffic for slaves upon the coast of Africa, to be exchanged for rum and molasses in the West Indies.

It is the very irony of history that New England afterward assisted in desolating Virginia because she undertook to defend the institution that New England had fastened upon her without her consent and against the protest of her delegates.

While the question of permitting the further importation of slaves was under discussion in the convention that framed the Constitution of 1789, Mr. Mason, of Virginia, denounced the slave trade with all the earnestness of his nature.

This infernal traffic—

He said—

originated in the avarice of British merchants. The British Government constantly checked the attempt of Virginia to put a stop to it. The present question concerns not the importing States alone but the whole Union.

Maryland and Virginia had already prohibited the importation of slaves expressly. North Carolina had done the same in substance. All this would be in vain if South Carolina and Georgia were at liberty to import.

Declaring, then, with great frankness, the strong sentiments of aversion he entertained to slavery itself, he concluded by saying "he lamented that some of our Eastern brethren had, from a lust of gain, embarked in this nefarious traffic."

Luther Martin, of Maryland, declared the slave trade "to be inconsistent with the principles of the Revolution and dishonorable to the American character to have such a feature in the Constitution."

In this state of things Gouverneur Morris, adverting to the circumstances that the sixth section of the same article then under consideration contained a provision "that no navigation act should pass without the consent of two-thirds of the members present in each House"—a provision particularly affecting the interests of the New England States—suggested that this, together with the fourth and fifth sections, should be referred to a committee, in order that a bargain might be formed between the parties out of these elements of special local interest on the one side and the other.

The suggestion was adopted, and on the second day afterward the committee reported, extending the slave trade to 1800, and striking out the provision requiring a two-thirds vote to enact a navigation law.

When the report came up in the convention General Pinckney, of South Carolina, moved to extend the slave trade to 1808, and the motion was seconded by Mr. Gorham, of Massachusetts.

Mr. Madison earnestly and eloquently opposed the motion, declaring it to be dishonorable to the American character, but his opposition was in vain.

Hand in hand Massachusetts and South Carolina led the cohorts of slavery, and the motion prevailed, all the New England States, with South Carolina, Georgia, Maryland, and North Carolina, voting for it, and Virginia, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware voting against it. Luther Martin was a member of the committee to which I have alluded, and in a letter afterward, to the Maryland House of Delegates, he says:

I found the Eastern States, notwithstanding their aversion to slavery, were very willing to indulge the Southern States at least with a temporary liberty to prosecute the slave trade, provided the Southern States would in their turn gratify them by laying no restriction on navigation acts.

In the ana of Mr. Jefferson can be found an account of an interview he had with Mr. Mason, corroborating the facts as I have given them; and the curious student of history and of human motives will find a full account of this "strange story" in Elliott's Debates, Hildreth's History of the United States, Bancroft's History of the Constitution, and the second volume of Rives's Life of Madison.

One of the results of this coalition, based on greed and selfishness, was swept away in a flood of tears and blood, and African slavery no longer exists upon this continent. The other, our present navigation laws, remains, a disgrace to our civilization and a curse to the country.

What are these laws, of which the birth was so disgraceful, and upon which such laudation is bestowed by Mr. Roach and his followers?

Briefly they are: That a vessel of the United States engaged in the foreign trade must be registered to entitle it to the rights and privileges of a vessel of the United States; and to be so registered must be built within the United States and belong wholly to citizens of the United States, or be captured in war and condemned as a prize, or be adjudged forfeited for breach of the laws of the United States, being wholly owned by citizens of the United States. No vessel can be registered, or, if registered, entitled to the benefits and privileges of a vessel of the United States, if owned in whole or in part by any citizen of the United States who usually resides in a foreign country, during the continuance of such residence, unless he be a consul of the United States or agent for a partner in some house of trade consisting of citizens of the United States, actually carrying on trade within the United States; or if owned in whole or in part by any naturalized citizen of the United States who resides more than one year in the country from which he came, or for more than two years in any foreign country, unless he be a consul or agent of the United States. No vessel registered as a vessel of the United States licensed or authorized to sail under a foreign flag and to have the protection of any foreign government during the existence of the rebellion can be deemed or registered as a vessel of the United States, or to have the rights and privileges of such vessels, except under provisions of law especially authorizing such register. A register may be issued to a vessel built in a foreign country when such vessel shall be wrecked in the United States and be purchased and repaired by a citizen of the United if the repairs equal three-fourths of the cost of such vessel when repaired.

If we did not know that these provisions could be found upon our statute-book they would be thought to have come from the rubbish of the Dark Ages, relics of barbarism long since passed away.

And yet, in the face of reason, right, experience, the dictates of self-interest, and even self-preservation, we persist in forbidding our citizens to buy ships, which they can not build, in order to enrich one or two men who own ship-yards in the United States.

We are told that we must regain our supremacy on the ocean; but how are we to regain it without ships equal in cost, speed, durability, and carrying capacity with those of our rivals?

Take the case of two farmers, with the same quantity of land, of the same quality, and worked with equal industry. The same sun shines upon both, and the same showers bless and refresh; but one uses the latest and most improved machinery and implements of labor, while the other uses the antique plow and spade of his forefathers, and is prohibited from buying other implements. Can there be any question as to the result?

When England found that we could excel in building and sailing wooden ships, what did her statesmen do? Did they adhere to the navigation laws enacted in the days of Cromwell, and similar to those we have now? Did they shut their eyes to the changed condition and forbid Englishmen to buy ships from America?

On the 1st day of January, 1850, the last vestige of the navigation laws was swept from the statute-books of England, and the course of her merchant marine has been onward to its present astonishing prosperity.

Governor Dingley says "that from 1849 for three years the merchant marine of the United States increased more rapidly as compared with that of the United Kingdom than ever before in the history of this country." But what became of that prosperity after three years? To-day Great Britain carries half the commerce of the whole world, while we barely manage to carry 15.5 per cent. of our own.

Can anything be worse than our present condition, unless it be the total annihilation of our shipping? Why should we adhere to a system which has permitted, even if it has not caused, our present degradation?

Mr. President, I do not mean to say that the repeal of the navigation laws will alone restore our merchant marine. I do not believe that any legislation will restore it at once, but I do believe that it can never be restored under our laws as they now are.

If we can not build ships we must buy them, and the laws which forbid this violate common sense and common right.

The great obstacle to the restoration of our shipping interest lies in the protective system, of which the navigation laws are a part. The high protective and exclusive tariff has stimulated production to an abnormal degree, and has put up the price of labor and also increased the cost of living. Our ships which go out upon the ocean to compete with those of other nations are handicapped by an excess in first cost, and by the fact that they are loaded when they go out, but have nothing to bring back.

We are competing with free trade, while our enormous tariff duties prevent other nations from trading with us.

Besides this, England is a great workshop, with a vast colonial system and the present control of one-half the commerce of the globe. To wrest this commerce from her iron grasp will be an almost hopeless task.

The glory of our merchant marine has departed because of stupid navigation laws and the inexorable laws of self-interest and trade. Cheap lands, high interest, enormous profits from railroads, manufacture, banking, have drawn both sailor and capitalist away from the ocean. The broad prairies have taken the place of the broad ocean, and the love of adventure and desire for gain have been alike gratified amid the mountains and upon the plains of the West. The brawn and sinew and hardy enterprise which manned the cruisers of 1812 are no longer found upon our ships. The deeds of Decatur and Hull and Bainbridge fall upon listless and indifferent ears, while the scream of the locomotive and the whirl and crash of the factory drown the stories of naval adventure and glory.

Not in one day or one night can a change be wrought. Changed laws and changed conditions must join, and many a weary year must come and go before our flag floats again in starry splendor above both land and ocean.

Mr. President, I have spoken earnestly and at some length, because I feel deeply the overwhelming importance of reviving our merchant marine, both to our material interests and our national honor and greatness.

In the year ending June 30, 1883, the total value of our exports and imports was $1,547,020,316. The exports of domestic merchandise amounted to $804,223,632, of which $619,269,449, or 77 per cent., came from agriculture. These enormous amounts will give some idea of the sums paid annually to foreign nations for carrying our commerce, when the same work should be done by our own ships and the profit paid to our own people.

It is not a question affecting only the seaboard States of the Union. The entire country is vitally interested, and the great grain-producing States of the Northwest, to whose people transportation is a subject of paramount importance, appreciate fully the magnitude of this question.

For the year ending June, 1882, the State of Missouri alone produced 23,819,300 bushels of wheat, 161,655,000 bushels of corn, and 30,374,200 bushels of oats, and as yet the agricultural interest of this great State is only in its infancy. Shall we ship our surplus products for the future, enormous as they must be, in foreign vessels? Or shall we revive our merchant marine and pay more than $150,000,000 annually to our own people for transportation, instead of sending that amount abroad?

Nor is this the only question. Our Navy is in as desperate a condition as our merchant marine. Although Congress has appropriated since 1866 the enormous sum of $385,000,000 for naval purposes, we are to-day virtually without a navy, and our seaboard cities at the mercy of Europe.

The merchant marine is the nursery of the Navy, and one is necessarily dependent on the other. We are now without ships and without sailors, for not more than 5 per cent. of the seamen on American vessels are Americans.

In this almost desperate condition what are we to do, and where can we find a remedy?

In my opinion no one measure will be found sufficient; nor do I believe it possible, no matter what we may do, to resume for years our place among maritime nations. When capital can no longer find speculative profits in mining and stock-jobbing and high interest; when our protective tariff shall be reduced to a revenue standard and the abnormal and fictitious prices, both for the cost of living and labor, shall be brought to a fair basis; when the cheap lands of the West shall have been sold and occupied, and our population shall have so increased as to cause sharp competition in every department of industry and investment, then our people will again turn to the ocean.

In the mean time let us repeal the navigation laws which disgrace the civilization of the age, and allow American citizens to buy ships where they can be bought most cheaply. This privilege is given the Englishman, the German, and the Frenchman; why should it be refused to the American?

If we do this, instead of listening to the interested clamor of a few owners of ship-yards, and adopt the reforms as to sailing a vessel contained in the bill before the Senate and then pay liberal and just compensation for ocean postage, we shall have done all that is possible for the American Congress.

It is suicide to adhere any longer to the narrow and bigoted system under which our shipping has gradually disappeared from the ocean. With each recurring year we are told that the next will see our ships again in every sea and the Navy an iron rampart on our seaboard. For twenty years and more we have heard this syren song, not in the soft, sweet strains that sought to woo Ulysses to his death, but in the hoarse and gutteral accents of Mr. John Roach, denouncing the advocates of free ships as emissaries of Great Britain and enemies of their country.

To continue on the road we have traveled is certain death to our merchant marine, now in the last stages of decline. In a change of our present laws is at least a hope, but without a change there is none.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator speaks about repealing the navigation laws. The term "navigation laws" may be used in a very indefinite manner. The Senator's proposed amendment does not repeal the navigation laws. What I desire the Senator to say is whether he proposes as the remedy or as one remedy for these evils to open our coastwise trade to competition from the ships that he would authorize to be purchased abroad?

Mr. VEST. I do not. My amendment does not go to that extent.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator himself propose it?

Mr. VEST. I do not propose it. I have not proposed it.

Mr. FRYE. Then I fail to see how those wages which are spoken of are to be affected.

Mr. VEST. Let me say to the Senator that I must have been very unfortunate in my statement. Here is an American vessel that goes to Liverpool and makes a contract there with sailors. She engages them of course at the prices that are paid in Liverpool. When she comes to the United States and that vessel touches the American seaboard our Revised Statutes step in and say, "No matter what the contract, you must reship your crew." Now, if the Revised Statutes were out of the way that American vessel could make a bargain with those sailors for that round trip or as many trips as it pleased, no matter what our coastwise wages are. Is there any other answer needed? Here the law steps in and takes an American by the throat and says, "I do not care what contracts you make, when you touch our shores you must reship your crew." I say it is wrong, unjust, impolitic.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have not a single word to say in reply to the animated and eloquent screed of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in favor of free ships and against our navigation laws. There is not in the naval appropriation bill which is now before the Senate a single clause or paragraph that in any way touches or raises the question of free ships or the navigation laws.

The Senator from Missouri is called away for an indefinite period and will not be here when the bill relating to American shipping comes up, as it will in a few days, and so I did not feel justified in appealing to him not to drag into the discussion of the naval appropriation bill this other great subject of free ships and the navigation laws; but I do now implore Senators to remember the habit and tradition and business forms and manner of this body. The appropriation bills have always been considered business bills, devoted to the subjects-matter contained in them. They raised enough subjects for discussion in the matters involved in their provisions, and all that is proper and right; but if it be the purpose to make the occasion of an appropriation bill the time for discussion upon all other matters, then Senators will see at once that the dispatch which we have been able to give to these bills will cease. All the more is it unnecessary to encumber the bill with such discussions, because the shipping bill has been made a special order and will come up naturally in a few days. So I hope we shall confine ourselves to the appropriation bill for the Navy Department, the needs of the Government in that branch of its service, and keep out all extraneous matters.

The Senator from Missouri last night before adjournment was so aggressive and so bitter in his treatment of the management of the Navy Department, and expressed so clearly his entire lack of confidence in the Department, and was so frank at last in declaring that whatever objections of detail he had to any of the provisions of the bill they all yielded to his one supereminent objection that he was unwilling to trust the Navy Department with the expenditure of any more money, that I shall be drawn into more of a discussion of some of the things stated by him and some of the reasons advanced by him for his position than I had intended. There are two or three of his propositions so fallacious, so wholly without ground, that I can not let the occasion go without attempting to answer them.

First and foremost the Senator is too bright a man, too old a Senator, too much in the habit of reading and investigating before he talks, to repeat the old and stale statement that $385,000,000 have been spent for the naval establishment in the last twenty years without results; that no account has been given of it; and that the record of that expenditure is such that the Navy Department ought to be shut off from any extra supplies at present. Does the Senator know the condition that the Navy Department found itself in at the end of the war for the suppression of the rebellion? Does he know that fleets and navies were improvised under the whip and spur of necessity at that time which served their purpose and did their work and then went out of existence like a dream? Does he know that ship after ship was built of green material that could only float in the waters for two or three brief years, and that the administrations succeeding the war found themselves with an establishment on hand that in the main was only fit to be broken up and sold; that during all those strenuous years the pressure that was upon the Navy Department was not to build ships for the future, but to maintain an existing blockade, to improvise a few fast cruisers, so that the depredations of the Alabama and her consort cruisers should be stopped by speedy ships that could chase and overtake and capture her?

The record upon this subject shows what sort of an establishment the Navy Department found itself in possession of at the close of the war. We built during the war 123 vessels in private yards at a cost of $43,138,116. We built in the navy-yards, their machinery being built in private yards, 56 vesssels, costing $21,300,821. We took from the merchant marine by purchase 497 vessels, costing $19,625,593, and 78 old canal-boats and schooners for the purpose of sinking and obstructing the harbors at a cost of $193,771. These are the figures and that is what during the war was improvised as a navy.

When the war ended and peace came we had nothing that went to make a permanent navy. The vessels that were taken from the merchant service could only run for a year or two afterward, and under acts of Congress these with other vessels which were useless were sold, realizing to the Government $15,000,000; but they went out of existence and made no part of a naval force afterward. There were fifteen to twenty wooden vessels on the stocks in the navy-yards. They had already cost from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000, and to finish them would cost $10,000,000 more. If the money had been put into them and finished them we should have only repeated England's experiment when she tried to utilize her wooden ships, and $100,000,000 that she had spent on that kind of naval construction went absolutely out of existence and being and was charged to profit and loss.

We had not in the Navy at that time a single iron screw-steamer nor a single modern compound engine, nor had such an engine been built in the country. What we should have done then, as England and as France and as Germany and other powers making any pretension to naval force have since done, was to have sat ourselves down and by liberal appropriations laid the foundations of an enduring navy. We have done nothing of that kind.

In all the years since, from 1865 to the present time, the only single special appropriation that has been made for the purpose of building new ships, and reconstructing the American Navy, has been that of $3,200,000 appropriated in 1873. What a contrast that is to other great powers in the world!

I have sent and got some of the figures here to show what has been done during these years by the other powers referred to by the Senator from Missouri. Take England. Ten armored ships she has built of the Dreadnought class that cost $23,020,960. The Inflexible alone cost $2,935,925, the Dreadnought herself costing $2,799,825. Sixty-two armored ships of the second class cost $87,209,180; eighty unarmored ships cost $33,432,525, and sixty-nine gunboats cost $6,008,000, making a grand total that Great Britain has expended during these years up to 1879 of $141,649,705, and since 1879 this sum has been added to enough to make it almost $200,000,000.

Other nations have followed in the same line of policy. France during this time has built five armored ships of the Formidable class, costing $14,000,000; sixty armored ships costing $65,000,000; and the total cost of her ships up to 1879 was $88,500,000; and enough more has been added since then to make it more than $100,000,000. Russia has built five first-class ships, at a cost of $7,025,000. The largest one, the Peter the Great, cost alone $2,800,000, more than we propose in this bill to appropriate this year for the new cruisers that are to be built hereafter. Italy, referred to by the Senator from Missouri last night as an example, has built the most powerful naval war ships known, of the Duilio class. Five of these cost $18,505,000, over $3,000,000 apiece. The Duilio cost $3,500,000, the Italia, the Lefanto, and the Colombo, $3,835,000 apiece. Ten other armored ships cost $9,445,000, and seventeen unarmored ships $4,300,000; making a total expenditure of $32,250,000 against our $3,200,000.

Germany has built five large and powerful vessels of the König Wilhelm class. She alone cost $2,492,000. Twenty-one armored ships cost $15,167,950, thirty-six unarmored ships over $12,600,000, making in all $37,100,000. Austria has built five armored, iron-hull ships, costing $6,154,890; five armored, wooden-hull ships, costing $7,409,360; and twenty-two unarmored ships, at a cost of $5,000,000, her total being $18,564,250. Turkey alone has expended in this time $17,228,500, against our $3,200,000. Grouping these six nations together, we have a total naval construction expenditure up to 1879 of $367,813,155, and the amount expended since 1879 certainly can not be less than $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 more. I have not the figures for the late years.

Now, contrast that with what we have done, $3,200,000, and then consider what was left to us from the war, and the wonder is to-day that we have even the remnant of a navy, that we have anything left upon the waters of the globe to bear our flag. The Senator from Missouri comes in and repeats that old, stale charge that $385,000,000 have been expended for the Navy during these last twenty years, and asks where it has gone and wants the Senate to pass a vote of want of confidence in the Navy administration or in the administration of the Government itself because of that.

He ought to know that that $385,000,000 does not represent a navy; it does not represent new ships. It represents simply the expenditures of the Department, and hardly a dollar of it has gone into anything like a new ship. These appropriations have been made for the running expenses of the Department. Does the Senator want to know how it is that money has gone? Let me tell him—for I have been getting the figures, some of them exact and some of them approximate.

Of that $385,000,000 which the Senator complains has been spent wantonly and unaccounted for in these twenty years, does the Senator know that $165,000,000 have gone for the pay of the Navy, a pay regulated by law, and upon which limitations are fixed by Congress, and of which not a dollar could enter into the construction of a vessel of the Navy any more than it could enter into the construction of his house in Missouri, or mine in Maine? There is $165,000,000 of it gone at once. Does the Senator know that for provisions and clothing, as essential as it is that life should be maintained in the Navy, over $30,000,000 have gone, and not a dollar of it has touched the structure of a new ship? Would the Senator like to be informed that for repairs and maintenance of navy-yards $70,000,000 have gone in these several years, and that not a dollar of that goes into building up and maintaining a navy? Does he know that in the Equipment Bureau for coal and other supplies needed to maintain the life of the Navy as it exists as much as air, water, and food are needed for man's sustenance, $20,000,000 have gone? And for repairs of old ships that came to us as a legacy from the war, that we have been straining to keep afloat, $41,000,000 have gone?

In these great items alone I have accounted for $326,000,000 out of his $385,000,000, and if I go into the details of the smaller bureaus, the Navigation Bureau, the Annapolis Academy, the naval asylums, and all the contingencies that have been appropriated for, his $385,000,000 is swept aside and accounted for, and not a dollar of it has gone or could go into the rebuilding a navy. And yet the Senator repeats that old story.

I have gone into this for the purpose and with the hope that during this discussion we shall hear no more of that oft-repeated cry of the $385,000,000 and the want of confidence expressed in the Navy Department because of that.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from Maine a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask him whether it is not just also to state that in addition to the sums of money which have been appropriated by Congress since 1866, which amount to $385,000,000 for the naval establishment, large sums, the proceeds of old vessels sold and old material sold, are not justly to be added to that?

Mr. HALE. No, sir; that is not so. All of the late sales have been in subordination to the enactments of Congress, which have been extremely rigid and thoroughly observed. Every sale of vessels or material in its results is turned into the Treasury, and the Navy Department gets no benefit from them. Immediately succeeding the war, when legislation was looser and when there was not that close scrutiny given to appropriations and to the sources of expenditure, a few million dollars additional went into the Navy Department, but that was dissipated in the expenditures that were made at that time.

Mr. BAYARD. It has not been in the direct line of my assignment of duty to examine these expenditures, but I had a very strong impression, which I confess remains, that to many contractors for vessels in the way of repairs not only was money paid but that old vessels were taken by them and material furnished to them which is not included in the total sum of the $385,000,000.

Mr. HALE. The total aggregate of what the Senator refers to at the time to which he alludes was so small that it does not make a component part of importance in the funds at the control of the Navy Department. If the Senator will examine the statute he will see how clearly it is defined there that every dollar received from the sale of old ships and old material must be turned into the Treasury. That has been insisted for years, and every dollar coming in that way goes in that manner into the Treasury, and has for the last twelve years.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me for one moment?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McPHERSON. Do I understand the Senator to say that the proceeds of the sales of old material are turned into the public Treasury?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. In every case?

Mr. HALE. In every case.

Mr. ALLISON. Now.

Mr. McPHERSON. If I remember aright, if the Senator will further yield to me for a moment, the distinct charge was made by the committee of investigation of the other House, called the Whitthorne committee, that large quantities of vessels and old material, the contents of navy-yards in which material had been stored and pi'ed up for a long term of years by excessive purchases, far beyond the wants of the service, were traded off to contractors for repairs of ships and the construction of new vessels, some of which the Senator will remember were commenced under great scandals in 1874. My information is, and the records of Congress show, that the Senator's statement is not exactly in accordance with the facts as set forth in that report. I believe that no Senator or member representing that side of the Chamber has ever yet undertaken to gainsay or resist successfully the conclusions of that report.

While I am on my feet, perhaps the Senator will allow me to make another observation. He takes occasion to criticise Senators upon this side of the Chamber for objecting to large appropriations of money for the increase of the Navy. Speaking for myself, I would not withhold appropriations for a proper increase of the naval service. I am anxious for appropriations, and for appropriations adequate to meet the exigencies of the times.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will not seek to interject a speech here.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am coming to my point. Since 1861 we have not been menaced by any foreign power, we have not needed these appropriations of money, and we have seemingly not needed a navy. Now, when we come to take into consideration the experience of the past, the scandals that have attended upon the Navy, the appropriations of money that have been squandered, which have been of no benefit to the country, and then when we take into consideration the existing condition in which that same state of affairs exists, when the party the Senator himself represents will still persist in keeping at the head of the United States Navy a man under whom no Senator upon this side of the Chamber and no fair-minded citizen has any confidence that the appropriations we here make will be either intelligently or honestly applied, then I say it comes with very poor grace to charge this side of the Chamber or any Senator here with a want of appreciation of the necessities of this Government.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am very glad that I let the Senator go on and that he did not sit down without discharging some of the bile that is in him against the Secretary of the Navy. The Senator would be very unhappy evidently in discussing naval appropriations unless he relieved himself of some of that feeling, and I am glad to have afforded him the opportunity of doing that.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator will pardon me a moment. I submit to him that is a very unfair way of treating a fact if the statement I make is a fact; and I think if the Senator will read the newspapers of the country and hear the statements that are made upon every hand, he will not charge it upon my bile or upon any opposition I have to the Secretary of the Navy. I have none—none whatever. I scarcely know him. I have no communication with him. I have never visited the Navy Department of this Government, although a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, since that gentleman has been at the head of the naval affairs of this country. But this I do say: if a great political organization in charge of the affairs of this Government will persist in keeping at the head of that Department a man who has not the confidence or even the respect of the people of this country that the appropriations made will be either intelligently or honestly employed, then the responsibility rests there, and it does not rest either with this side of the Chamber or with the people of the country.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have made no allusion to that side of the Chamber. The subjects that are mainly of importance in this appropriation bill which is under my charge are subjects-matter upon which the Senate has already made its record. The new ships that are contemplated in the amendments to this appropriation bill are the ships provided for by a bill which passed the Senate and upon which, a yea-and-nay vote being taken, were found in its favor many of the old and leading and conservative and wise Senators upon the other side of the Chamber. And the Senator from New Jersey is most unjust when he intimates that I have made any reproach to his side of the Chamber. What I was saying was meant to be directed to the Senator from New Jersey, and I do not recognize the assumption that he represents his side of the Chamber, because it has been true heretofore that many Senators upon that side have realized the deplorably helpless condition in which the United States finds itself to-day and have sought early and late to aid and further and advance measures that shall relieve us from that humiliating attitude. The discussion already had upon the bill for the construction of cruisers has developed the fact that Senators upon the other side realize, as the Senator from New Jersey does not seem to do, that there are things which rise above party lines.

I hope, sir, that I shall not live many years before I shall see the American Navy what it ought to be, the pet of the American people. No matter what administration comes into power, no matter how long it shall remain, no matter when it shall go out and be succeeded by an administration representing the opposite faith in politics, the American Navy ought to be the cherished child of every administration; it ought to be, as in its past, the pride and the pet of the American people. We do not need much of an army. If we ever shall need it we can improvise it with the stamping of a foot. But the American people ought not to go on another year without showing to the powers of the world that if complications ensue, as they may in diplomacy, we have at our hand the means to defend ourselves and to maintain our honor; and that is a question which, to me, it is self-evident rises entirely above party considerations, and I do not believe that the Senator from New Jersey represents his party in this body in the opposition that he makes early and late to the provisions that are incorporated in this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the request of the Senator I will read the section of the Revised Statutes which requires the proceeds of public property to be covered into the Treasury—an ordinary proceeding conducted every day:

SEC. 3618. All proceeds of sales——

Mr. McPHERSON. Approved when?

Mr. HALE. Passed in its present form in 1872.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was passed first in 1847, amended in 1866, and amended by one or two acts since.

Mr. HALE. The main amendment was passed in 1872.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is the form in which it stands in the Revised Statutes, which contains the result with the exceptions that have been made:

SEC. 3618. All proceeds of sales of old material, condemned stores, supplies, or other public property of any kind, except—except the proceeds of the sale or leasing of marine hospitals, or of the sales of revenue-cutters, or of the sales of commissary stores to the officers and enlisted men of the Army, or of the sale of condemned navy clothing, or of sales of materials, stores, or supplies to any exploring or surveying expedition authorized by law, shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, on account of "proceeds of Government property," and shall not be withdrawn or applied, except in consequence of a subsequent appropriation made by law.

And the amount of these sales is to be stated by each head of Department every year in his annual statement and reports which are published annually.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to ask——

Mr. HALE. I can not yield further, because if I do my time will all be consumed. I wish to go on in the thread that I began of answering the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON in the chair). The Senator from Maine is entitled to the floor and insists upon occupying it.

Mr. McPHERSON. The statement made by the honorable Senator from Ohio is very misleading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine will proceed.

Mr. HALE. I do not mean to be discourteous in any way to the Senator from New Jersey. If he has any question to ask, I shall yield to him.

Mr. McPHERSON. I thought I answered the question that has been put practically by the Senator from Ohio. The Senator will understand that the law from which he read was one passed to prevent the continuance of doing exactly the things which I charge upon the Department. It was found that the law previous to that time had been violated; it was altogether too loosely drawn, and the Secretary of the Navy evaded the practical and just interpretation of the law, and what has been read is an additional law that was then passed.

I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio this question: With that law upon the statute-book is it possible for a Secretary of the Navy to order an ironclad worth $1,700,000 to be towed to the ship-yard of John Roach and only by a telegraphic message order her to be broken up?

Mr. SHERMAN. That has nothing to do with the sale of vessels.

Mr. McPHERSON. And then sold as old scrap.

Mr. HALE. The law that has been read by the Senator from Ohio had nothing whatever to do with the Navy Department, but was a general law passed to meet all the needs. I remember very well when it was passed, because I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations in the House of Representatives; and it had nothing whatever to do specially with the Navy.

The Senator from Missouri in attacking this bill has declared himself entirely dissatisfied with its provisions, and especially with reference to the new cruisers that are provided for in it. Now, let us look at that for a moment; let us see what the Committee on Appropriations has done, what it has incorporated on this bill for the action of Congress, of the Senate first.

Some weeks ago the Naval Committee, on bills that had been referred to it, took up the whole subject of the construction of new ships for the Navy, and after most patient hearings, after summoning distinguished officers of the Navy, the Secretary, the members of the advisory board, and other officers known to represent the best interests of the Navy and commanding the confidence of the country from very long and meritorious service, reported a bill for additional cruisers of the class that are now being built, which were authorized last year and appropriated for; and after full discussion the Senate passed the bill and sent it to the House of Representatives, which from that day to this has made no sign in the direction of responding to the demands made upon its attention by the overwhelming vote of the Senate.

In this condition of affairs the Committee on Appropriations, realizing that it is the only way to bring the House of Representatives to an expression upon this subject, and in order to make the issue, has done what has been done ever since the foundation of the Government, put the provision for building these ships upon the naval appropriation bill, not as new legislation, but simply as continuing and augmenting the present naval establishment of the Government, which is recognized by law and may be appropriated for from year to year. It has put upon this measure that bill in terms as passed by the Senate, passed by almost the solid votes of this side of the Chamber and by nearly or quite half the Senators on the other side, and that is the question before the Senate now, and the Senator from Missouri says first that there is no good in these ships, that they are not what we want, that they are precisely what we do not want, and that nobody has any confidence in them whose authority and judgment is worth considering, and he has quoted Admiral Porter in the speech that he made last night against this scheme.

Why, Mr. President, one of the leading advocates of these ships, one of the officers of the Navy who was eager, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES], who I see now is attending to what I say, will remember—one of the most eager advocates for the building of more ships of this kind like the Chicago and the Atlanta and the Boston and the Dolphin and the gunboats was Admiral Porter himself. The fault that he found was that the committee was not appropriating for enough ships of this class. When he was asked:

Senator BUTLER. What number of additional ships do you think we want of the class provided for?

Referring to the very class contained in the bill, this was his answer:

Admiral PORTER. I think you ought to build now twice as many as you propose in that bill.

No lack of confidence there.

It is just as easy to build them as the others, and there is plenty of money in this country—more than we know what to do with.

Senator BUTLER. You mean cruisers?

Admiral PORTER. Yes, sir, the cruisers; and then we should go to work and build fifteen or twenty of these gunboats at once, and fifteen or twenty torpedo-boats of 100 feet length, which will run from nineteen to twenty knots an hour. All that can be done rapidly.

Senator BUTLER. And then ten or a dozen cruisers?

Admiral PORTER. Yes, of large size. I speak from knowledge; I know what the country wants, and we do not want less than twelve ships of the Chicago size; we want from forty to fifty ships right off of the size of the Boston and Atlanta. I say it is an absolute necessity. If we should be suddenly involved in a war with the smallest of naval powers, we would be the most humiliated people in the world. We would have to stop boasting of our great war resources, and every man who had held an office affecting the Navy would try to throw the blame of its inefficiency on some one else.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In that connection will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. He will remember that Admiral Porter in that examination stated that in the course of a few years, under the authority of Congress now given and which some of our friends here opposed, there would not be a ship in the Navy, and unless some provision of law was made to substitute the old ships with new ones there would not be a vessel on the ocean to carry the American flag.

Mr. HALE. That is found immediately following what I have read. Rear-Admiral Jenkins, a distinguished officer of the Navy, was summoned. He says:

I believe I have read everything printed officially, and I have read all the criticisms that have come into my possession, foreign and domestic, in relation to the scheme of the advisory board, and so far as I am able to judge I approve of every recommendation they have made. Of course a ship is a very complex thing. Very few things in this world are perfect. We must run a little risk. Men have different opinions and all can not be right. We prove in the end who is right. I believe that the recommendations of the advisory board in regard to the first ships, those now being built and those proposed, are as good as could be provided in any country.

I could go on over this little volume, which gives all the testimony, and I could read page after page. This is true, that the Committee on Naval Affairs, which originally reported and was the sponsor of this measure, was struck forcibly with the unanimity of the officers of the Navy in approval of these ships—not entire, not complete unanimity; one or two exceptions; but all of those were explained away and the residuum was that the Navy Department believe in these ships, believe they will make the best cruisers in the world, believe that we should go on building more and more each year and that they should not be delayed.

The Senator from Missouri says that is not what we want; we want ships for coast defense; we want ships such as the great powers of Europe are building; and he instances Italy especially, which has excited his admiration by the building of heavy ships that she has engaged in and completed in the last few years. That is undoubtedly the fact. But does the Senator from Missouri realize how long it takes to make one of those ironclads, one of those war ships of the class of the Lepanto, of the Duilio, or the Colombo? He alluded to one of those as having been built last year in Italy. Why, Mr. President, I have here a statement of the length of time required to build ships and armament of the class referred to by the Senator from Missouri. The Inflexible, one of the great English armored ships of the heaviest class, took seven years to finish; the Dreadnought took nine, the Agamemnon seven, the Téméraire four, and the Monarch, a second-class armored ship, took three years, the smallest time given of any ship of the kind.

In France the Formidable has been building for years, and is yet incomplete; the Friedland, named from one of Napoleon's great battles and victories, took nine years to build; the Tonnerre took five years to build. In Italy the Italia has been under process of construction from 1876 to 1880, and is yet unfinished; the Lepanto has taken seven years, from 1876 to 1883, and is yet incomplete; the Duilio took from 1873 to 1880, seven years to build; the Dandolo from 1873 to 1882, nine years; the Princesse Amadeo from 1865 to 1875, ten years.

The building of every one of these immense mammoth structures for harbor defense or for war purposes is an exploit in itself and requires years for completion. I do not say that we should not start out; and before this bill passes, if nobody else shall propose, I do not know but that I will myself offer an amendment calling on the Secretary of the Navy to submit to Congress plans at the next session for the cost and expense and time it would take to build one of these monstrous structures of modern naval construction. But the Senator should see, as any man ought to see, that we for our protection need something beside these armored ships for harbor defense.

One of the things that contributed largely to keeping the hands of European powers off us in the war, that maintained and preserved Great Britain's neutrality, was the immense power that the American people showed of improvising a navy at that time. The fast ships that we built and sent out that pursued the corsairs frightened the English Government for fear that if hostilities occurred their whole commercial marine would be at our mercy. And I tell you, Mr. President, that with a good fleet of steel cruisers such as we started last year, such as are provided for in this bill, cruisers such as will overtake nine out of ten of the merchant ships of any power, steam or otherwise, the United States stands in a position where she can bid defiance to any foreign power.

I do not say that the Inflexible or the Dreadnought or the Duilio or the Lepanto, if they were laid alongside the Chicago or the Atlanta, by a single discharge could not blow her out of the water. These ships are not built for any such conflict as that. But let it be known that we have in our control a dozen ships of the Chicago class, twenty ships of the Boston and Atlanta class, making from sixteen to seventeen and eighteen miles an hour on the seas of the globe and ready to be sent out, and any administration in Great Britain, in France, or Germany, or any power will think twice before they will take a hostile attitude on any of the questions in which we are vitally interested here. Let that be known and felt, and it is better than anything else in preserving America and the American continent from the interference of any foreign power; and that is what these ships are made for largely.

Besides that, they are ships that will take the place of the Trenton and the Tennessee and the other wooden ships which are now fast falling into decay and must soon cease representing our flag the world over. I do not believe there is a Senator here who will get up in his place and declare that he wants to see the American flag blotted out from the ports of the world. No matter if our commerce has been decaying, the time will come when it will revive. When investments are profitable in American commerce, when it is seen that the vast bulk of the money which has been invested in internal enterprises and improvements can be better adapted to service upon the waters of the globe and a mercantile marine will pay, then the American mercantile marine will raise itself to something like its old prestige and its old prominence; and whenever that comes the American people, no matter what administration has power, ought to be in possession of a good navy that shall represent us everywhere all over the globe; and it is for that purpose that these ships are made. They are useful in that respect every day of their lives.

But the Senator says that he does not want to be dictated to and that he objects to this scheme for enriching contractors and for enriching John Roach. There is another thing that has been heard early and late here, like the $385,000,000 charge. I have nothing to say of Mr. John Roach. I have the barest acquaintance with him. I have not seen the man for a year except once meeting him on the street. I can say when it is charged that these are simply schemes for enriching and building him up while our merchant marine is growing less, that neither the Committee on Naval Affairs that sponsored this bill first nor the Committee on Appropriations that has put it on the appropriation bill has ever seen the face of John Roach or has ever heard the footfall of his foot, or has known of his presence in Washington. I do not know that he has been here during the consideration of any of these measures. Mr. John Roach, I take it, has business to attend to. If it makes him offensive to Senators or Representatives or anybody that he is a business man, that he is a prosperous man, I can not help that. I was interested in the debate that took place the other day. When the bill was before the Senate, on the report of the Naval Committee, this same gentleman was referred to. I was interested in the testimony that was brought out in the colloquy with reference to Mr. Roach. This occurred on February 27 in this Chamber.

Mr. BUTLER. There is John Roach again, the bête noire of my friend from New Jersey and my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. MCPHERSON. No; I have a great respect for Mr. Roach. I admire his pluck, his enterprise, his progress. I do not blame Mr. John Roach for competing with all comers for the business of the United States as well as for private business.

And later:

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from New Jersey says he has a very high respect for Mr. John Roach.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I said for his pluck, for his enterprise, and for his progressiveness.

Mr. BUTLER. For his pluck, for his enterprise, and for his progressiveness.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not question his honesty in fair competition.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator does not question his honesty. Then we have the Senator down to some point where we can put our hand upon him.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Certainly.

I have taken occasion because of the iteration and the reiteration of the charge about Mr. Roach, in whom I have not the least interest but who is continually involved in these discussions touching naval appropriations, to send to the Department and get the record of Mr. Roach as to all his transactions there, and I have it here.

When the war closed Mr. Roach was not a ship-builder. He had been engaged in furnishing engines and machinery for ships that were fitted out by private enterprise or by the Government, and the question came up of new engines first for the new ships that were being built. Mr. Roach's first bid for two pairs of engines of the Guerriere class was $760,000. No other builder bid the same as he, and the contract was not closed. Nineteen pairs of engines were given out to other builders at $400,000 each, or $20,000 on each bid higher than Mr. Roach. There was certainly no complication there; there was no influencing or controlling improperly the Navy Department. When the contract was finally given for the Wampanoag class, Mr. Roach built one pair for $680,000, while the other contractors got $700,000. On every engine that he built of that class the Government profited $20,000 over the other contractors. The next work that he did was on the Dunderberg, which Mr. Webb was then building, which was afterward sold to the French Government, and our Government itself made money in the transaction.

After this other questions came up, and other bids and contracts were put out and made by the Navy Department. The proposition arose for putting compound engines in the Tennessee. The old engines had been found comparatively useless. The needs and wants of the world had demonstrated that compound engines were better and should be put wherever they could be into our ships. The project was advanced of sending abroad to see what could be done there in the way either of getting models or purchasing these engines; but Mr. Roach, with an enterprise that I think has characterized him always, believed that it could be done in America, and he made this proposition to the Department: He said that the navy-yards could not build these compound engines and put them into the Tennessee; that he would agree to build them with these results, putting himself under bond to accomplish the following things: First, that the engines should take up 30 per cent. less room than the old ones had, 30 per cent. less weight, and burn 30 per cent. less fuel, and furnish 40 per cent. more speed.

That does not look like a proposition of a charlatan or a contractor who is seeking to make money improperly out of one of the Departments of the Government. He went on with that notwithstanding it was said in the navy-yards and by some men in charge at the Department that it was utterly impossible for him to do this, that he was proposing a dream that no man could realize, and yet he did it.

The next transaction was building the combined engines for the Trenton. Those were advertised for and the following were the bids: Woodruff Iron Works, of Hartford, $675,000, in fourteen months' time; Quintard Iron Works, $665,000, in twelve months' time; Atlantic Works, of Boston, $663,000, in fourteen months' time; William Wright & Co., of Newburg, $650,000, in fourteen months' time; John Roach, $635,000, in ten months' time.

Thus his bid was $15,000 lower than the next lowest, $32,000 less than the average, and two months less in time of work. That does not look to me like the record of a corruptionist or a man who is not willing to submit to fair competition, for these firms that competed with him were bright, able, enterprising firms who knew what they were about and what they could do.

In 1873 the Government appropriated the $3,200,000 that I have alluded to for the construction of engines and of sloops of war. Bids were called for to build seven pairs of compound engines. The Atlantic Works of Boston was the lowest bidder and received two pairs, all that they certified they could do. The rest were built by the Quintard Works, the Woodruff Works of Hartford, William Wright & Co., of Newburg, and Murphy & Co. The price paid for these engines was $175,000 each. Mr. Roach secured the contract for one of the smaller engines at $125,000 and carried it out.

Next the two sloops of war were advertised, and by this time Mr. Roach had got into condition that he was building the finest ships that could be produced on the American continent. The bidders for these were, Harlan & Hollingsworth, $350,000 each; William Cramp & Sons, $325,000 each; John Roach, $290,000 for one, or $580,000 for both; the Atlantic Works, $320,000 for one, or $640,000 for both; and thus Mr. Roach's bid was $60,000 lower than the next bid. That would look to me like good business. I know nothing about these transactions except as the record shows them, and the showing is complete.

The next work was under advertisement for a section of the docks at the Pensacola navy-yard. The bids there run from $341,436, the highest, to $219,000 by Mr. Roach, or $60,000 saved to the Government by that contract which he carried out.

Then came the completion for the iron-clad monitors, all of which was under committees raised by the Department on due bids and competition, and where the work was divided between the best constructors in the country, one vessel being at one place, another at another, and another at another, and a fourth in California.

At last, in 1883, Mr. John Roach, who seems to stalk, like Banquo's ghost, who will never down, as the representative of immorality and corruption, was brought into competition with other contractors for the new cruisers and ships provided in the bill that we passed last year, and if anybody has the curiosity to look at those he will discover that proposals were sent out all over the country to business firms; that eight or ten of them competed, and that the competition in every way was animated; that every ship-builder had the opportunity of putting in his bid. Here is a statement of those bids:

I have heard no charge made but that in these contracts everything was open and aboveboard. Congress set itself carefully to provide safeguards and provisions that would free them from any danger or any suspicion; and the correspondence that is submitted by the Navy Department from all these contractors shows how it was that Mr. Roach was enabled to underbid.

Now I dismiss him. I care nothing more about him. I do not know that he will ever have a contract to build another ship for the American Navy, and so far as I can gather from business men who know Mr. Roach and from information that Senators on this floor are better capable of producing than I, it is a matter of little account to him whether he builds ships for the Navy or not. He terrifies the souls of men who contemplate any connection of his with building ships in the American Navy, but it is not of any consequence whether he does or not.

Mr. Roach has one of the greatest establishments in the world for the building of iron and steel ships. He competes with the world in the manufacture of these structures. He has built, outside of everything done for the Government, as I understand, eighty ships, ranging from a thousand tons up to 4,500. He is a busy man. The Government is not to him a client that he must follow, or he would have been knocking day after day at the doors of the committee-rooms of the committees who have charge of this subject-matter. But he has done nothing of that kind; and if John Roach should disappear to-day the American Navy would not in its course of being rebuilt be obstructed; and if the American Navy should disappear to-day Mr. John Roach would go on in his business, as I understand, and there I dismiss him. I have only sent for this record in order that I might see myself, for I did not know it before, what it was in the past that had raised the hue and cry that has followed after him and every contract that he has been engaged in.

Now, Mr. President, the bill that the committee has reported after careful consideration not only provides for the building of the additional cruisers and the gunboats, but also for continuing the work which Congress at the last session embarked upon in the completion of the double-turreted ironclads, the Puritan, the Amphitrite, the Terror, and the Monadnock, which latter lies in California. All that question was fought out in the Senate last year, and after a most animated controversy the Senate embarked in the policy and the House sustained it on the naval bill for finishing these monitors, and we spent last year a million dollars upon them.

The committee has provided in this bill for $2,000,000 more under all the safeguards that it could throw around it, and that is intended to cover partially the feature that rests in the mind of the Senator from Missouri as to the necessity for harbor defenses. I believe that when these double-turreted monitors are finished, while they are not of the first class like the Inflexible and the Dreadnought and the Lepanto and the Dandolo and the greatest of the French ironclads, yet compared with any others of theirs they will be the most formidable structures of the sort afloat.

I shall feel myself better about that defenseless condition of our coast which the Senator from Missouri more eloquently portrayed than I can do when the Puritan is finished, when she has her guns mounted, and when she is ready upon any alarm to steam to the mouths of the harbors of our great cities and lay herself athwart the path of any foe that may menace. The sleep of men and women and children will be more secure at night when she is completed. The Appropriations Committee has sought in its report to provide for that, not as an initiatory proceeding, but because the Senate and the House in accord last winter contributed to this end and embarked on this enterprise and spent a million dollars, which will have been wasted if we do not go on.

There are other provisions of the bill with reference to armament, with reference to guns, and if any fault can be found it is that the committee have not gone far enough. The matter of the construction of these great guns, like that of these great naval ships, is one of years; it can not be done in a year nor in two years, and we can not set up an establishment for making the forgings, the tubes, the jackets, and the rings of these great guns, from the 8-inch caliber up, and the gun factory that afterward completes them, for less than nearly $2,000,000; and if we go on under them, and with the ponderous hammers that we put in there, and with all the modern machinery which the ingenuity of man can devise, if we put ourselves in a condition where we can make our own guns of every kind and class, we can not turn out then a number of guns sufficient to fit out a rehabilitated navy for less than from a million to a million and a half or two million dollars a year.

But for one, sir, I believe that the American people are ready to see Congress embark in that expenditure. I do not believe that the picayunish policy that has been pursued by the House of Representatives for six years until within two years ago, the cutting and paring down of every appropriation and limiting and crippling the Navy Department, has any seat in the popular regard or esteem or opinion. I believe that the American people are ready to see that this work goes on and that Congress can not be better engaged or doing a more meritorious thing for the whole country than to do the things that the committee propose shall be done on this bill, and even more.

I say again in closing that this is a matter which has nothing whatever to do with party feeling. Of the appropriations that are provided in this bill only the smallest fraction can be expended by the present administration. Whatever administration succeeds, if it be that of my friends on the other side or another administration represented by this side of the Chamber, that administration has got to go on with the great work of building the American Navy, and as I have said once before, I hope I shall be found when that time comes, if the administration is in the hands of my friends on the other side, doing everything that I can do to uphold the hands of a Secretary of the Navy who is put into power by that administration, for I shall be slow to believe that any administration will put a man at the head of this great Department who will not administer its affairs honestly, who will not scrutinize contracts, who will not feel that the chief thing that he has to do touching himself is to establish a reputation for integrity and honesty.

I am not here, and am not called upon to reply at length to the intimations of the Senator from Missouri or from New Jersey of lack of confidence in the Secretary of the Navy. I only say this: He has been there during all this discussion for the last two years engaged in contracting for ships of different kinds, in carrying out the provisions of Congress for expending money. He has had all the glare of scrutiny of everybody upon him; he has had men following him who would be glad if there was an opportunity to trip and to catch him, and I say here and now, and I invite attention to my proposition, that I ask any man before this discussion ceases, if he can to put his finger on one single thing that the present Secretary of the Navy has done in his administration of the Navy Department which even suggests or raises a suspicion that anything is wrong. If there is anything of that kind I want it to come out.

If the Secretary of the Navy is not to be trusted, if Congress can not safely put money in his hands to expend—and we raised the other day a committee of which you, sir [Mr. WILSON in the chair], have the honor to be the head, to look into just such transactions—but the day some time ought to come when the head of a great Department of the Government who has no voice upon this floor, who can not be seen or heard here, shall be free from such insinuations or imputations when nothing is given to back them up.

I believe that the Secretary of the Navy is engaged in a good work. I believe that he has weeded out of the Department one abuse after another. I believe, and my investigation and acquaintance with the Navy Department lead me to believe, that in the appropriations of money intrusted to his hands he is most scrupulous and zealous in protecting the interests of the Government. I believe that no contractor can come to him and demand and obtain undue favors.

I remember that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] said the other day when the first discussion came up that while he could not bear testimony to confidence in the Secretary of the Navy in his political course heretofore, he knew of nothing (and his eye is keen and scrutinizing upon these things) worthy of fault-finding on the part of the Secretary of the Navy during his administration of the Department. He has striven zealously to raise the spirit of the naval establishment; he has made it seen in that establishment that personal favors can not be given there, and that all shall be treated impartially. He has made it seen that officers of the Navy who have been dismissed for lack of good conduct, for lack of skill, for negligence, and for drunkenness have no warrant from him and no encouragement to come back. He has helped to raise the spirit of the corps and of the service, so that the other day when the Government provided for an expedition to the northern seas fraught with the greatest danger and with terrors that might well appall a stout heart, and word was sent out for voluntary contribution of service to the Navy Department, the most excellent officers in it, those who are in the easiest places about Washington and elsewhere, gladly responded to the summons, and put themselves at his disposition to go upon that far-off, dangerous quest. Already I can see that the American Navy is being bettered by his administration. Neither does he come here and clamor for appropriations or for votes of confidence. Striving thus faithfully as he is, it has seemed to me hard that continually he should be subjected to insinuations and imputations with nothing given to back them.

I have spoken longer than I intended. I did not mean when the bill came up to consume time in long speeches, but to spend myself in answering questions and removing objections. What the Senator from Missouri said called me to my feet, and that has been followed by what the Senator from New Jersey said. I hope and believe that when the Senate considers this subject broadly and largely, when it sees the needs which are upon us, that by a unanimity as great as that with which we passed the bill the other day it will send this bill to the House with these amendments, and then we shall know whether either branch of the American Congress will stand in the way of the pronounced public demand for a creditable American navy.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question, something in relation to the amendment that I find on pages 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21 of this bill. It relates to an appropriation for building a number of new cruisers.

Mr. HALE. The amendment beginning on line 383?

Mr. BAYARD. On page 16. It provides for the building of new cruisers. I have read it, but I have not placed it in comparison with the bill we voted for and which passed the Senate. I ask the Senator whether this amendment is in the same language and terms as the bill that was passed by the Senate about six weeks ago?

Mr. HALE. I believe precisely. I will tell the Senator how I got the language of this amendment. The bill that we passed has never been printed in the shape we passed it. It lies on the Speaker's table, and under the rules of the House is not printed until referred. I sent to the House of Representatives and had an exact copy made of that bill and incorporated that as my amendment. I have not myself read the amendment in comparison with that bill, but that can be done.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not mean to ask the Senator as to the precision of resemblance between the two, but whether that amendment is the same bill in substance that we passed here.

Mr. HALE. Precisely the same.

Mr. BAYARD. Having passed this bill by so largely affirmative a vote, in which I was very glad to join, and which passed, I think, by a vote of three to one in this Chamber, will the Senator inform me why it is necessary now to repeat the action of the Senate? A bill for this purpose has already passed, it has gone to the other branch, and I would ask the Senator why in the form of an amendment to an appropriation bill he ingrafts this general legislation anew?

Mr. HALE. I will tell the Senator exactly. I am glad he asks the question. First, I do not admit or believe that it is a measure of general legislation. I have examined the precedents, and all through the history of the Government appropriations for additional ships have been put on to appropriation bills upon the ground that it was appropriating for an existing establishment. Even last year the Senate put the measure for building cruisers on the appropriation bill. One main reason, let me tell the Senator, why this was first considered and reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs was this—not that I had any doubt or that the majority of the Committee on Appropriations had any doubt that it might not put the bill on first, but in the last Congress the Committee on Appropriations was reproached because it sought to intrude subjects of this kind without the consent and accord and companionship of the Naval Committee, and therefore when I went upon that committee I believed and the Naval Committee believed that it was better that the investigation should be made by that committee first, and that this measure should have the approval of that committee. There never was a moment, let me tell the Senator from Delaware, when, if the appropriation bill had come up first, I should not have been in favor of putting it on, as was done last year.

Now, in addition as a reason, let me say that the bill has gone to the House, and it has, metaphorically speaking, snapped its fingers in the face of the Senate; it has not even taken it from the Speaker's table and referred it. Whether that is the will of a majority I do not know, whether that is the belief of a majority we can not tell until it is tested; but it is easy enough under the rules of the House to stifle that bill so that neither the Senator from Delaware, nor I, nor any of the majority here who passed it can ever get a record upon it.

It will lie there in that tomb entombed for this session, and for the next if that is deemed best. Therefore, upon that account the Committee on Appropriations thought—not in any way interfering, but in accordance with repeated precedents—that if we really believed in building up an American navy we should take advantage of everything that the rules give us, and should do what has been done repeatedly, put this appropriation on the naval appropriation bill. It is simply for augmenting and increasing an existing naval establishment. Suppose the Navy were struck out of existence by storm upon the sea, does the Senator, does anybody believe that Congress can not appropriate in an appropriation bill for restoring it? Where is the difference between building the Chicago and building a boat at the Kittery navy-yard or at the Norfolk navy-yard? It is simply in the direction of extending and augmenting an existing and legal establishment of the Government, and that is why the committee has done this.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to ask the Senator whether in his judgment the Committee on Appropriations could have put in ten vessels as well as seven if they thought it right?

Mr. HALE. I think there is no difference in principle. That is a matter of discretion.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I was surprised when I found the reintroduction and, as I believe, in the words themselves, of a bill which had already been fully debated and had passed the Senate. I was surprised to find that bill transplanted and ingrafted upon a naval appropriation bill which had come to us from the House of Representatives, providing for the necessities of the Navy as it then existed. At first I thought that this amendment was out of order under our rules, and I examined the rules and discovered that it is within the exception provided for by the rules against amendments to appropriation bills in the nature of general legislation, because it is expressly allowed by the rule—I forget its number—that measures which have passed the Senate at the same session may be, in the discretion of the Senate, accepted as amendments to appropriation bills. Therefore I am disposed to believe that under the rules of the Senate this amendment is in order. But then comes the other question, why should the Senate pass the same bill twice, first separately, and in a few weeks thereafter as an amendment to an appropriation bill? The answer of the Senator from Maine is that we have reason to believe, or if not to believe to suspect, that the other branch of Congress will not act favorably at least, if they act at all, upon the bill that passed the Senate and has gone to them.

Mr. HALE. I see, I think, what the Senator is driving at. There should be a complete observance of courtesy between the two Houses; I agree to that; there ought to be.

Mr. BAYARD. There must be.

Mr. HALE. If the Senate pass this and put it before the House, if the House maintains its attitude, no one branch can drive the other. It has got to be a matter of fair agreement and consideration, and one must yield in whole or in part. I might have said this, that under the rules of the House, which, as the Senator knows, seem to obstruct rather than further business, I believe it will be impossible for the House to consider our separate bill; that they can not consider it under the rules.

Mr. BAYARD. I know nothing really of the rules of the House, I confess. There is a veil of mystery surrounding those rules which I have never been able to penetrate, and never having been a member of the House I never thought it necessary to exert my poor faculties in endeavoring to comprehend them, nor do I think it is within my purview as a Senator to study the rules of the House.

I am glad to hear the Senator take the ground that I have taken before against the right of either House to coerce, or I may say further to attempt to coerce, the independent judgment of the other. However much I may wish or think that the Navy of the United States should be increased by a number of vessels—and I do think so, and I said so, and I hold to that statement—I do not believe I have the right to cause the appropriations for the Navy as it stands under existing law, the pay of the men and the officers and the rigging of ships, and so on to be conditioned on the fact that one House shall compel the other to accept its judgment.

Some years ago this question was raised. I remember it well. Gentlemen who ordinarily agree with me in their party action differed from me on the subject, but I never had a doubt that to accept the contrary doctrine would be to resolve all the powers of the Government into one or the other of the two Houses and allow conditions to be put under which the Government should live only by the sufferance of either House. I do not believe in that. Therefore it was that I looked upon a naval appropriation bill having ingrafted upon it new features not necessary for the subsistence of the Navy as it now exists as being a measure of very doubtful policy and one which I did not think the Senate would maintain when the point came whether the necessary appropriations to maintain the Navy in its present status should have ingrafted upon it a separate measure which had met the approval of the Senate alone but which did not meet the approval of the House.

Now as to the facility of business, I am not here to urge any small or petty objection; I have not the least objection; on the contrary I think it is the wisest way to allow the issues of opinion between the two parties that control the country to pass fairly and squarely before the country that they may be understood. That is all we can do. The arbitration between the differences of party and the differences of the Houses will be finally submitted to the great court at whose bar we shall appear and plead when the question of the public policy of the country is to be considered by the people at large. The great thing is to make up issues fairly, to make up issues distinctly. If there is anything to gain strength to a party from insisting upon a measure, let them gain it. If there shall be loss, let that loss fall where it may.

I have no objection to that, but I do not want supplies to carry on the various branches of this country's Government to depend upon wrangles between the two Houses as to measures which are outside of the appropriations germane and necessary to execute existing laws.

I know it was the intention of the Senate, at least I believe it to have been the intention of the Senate, to treat this ingrafting of legislation (whether you may call it general or special) upon appropriation bills with disfavor. We considered that, and I believe it was a common opinion expressed here that it was a vicious system of legislation. Certainly I do not think that the executive branch or that either House of Congress ought to submit or ought to be asked to submit to anything like coercion by obtaining supplies to carry on the legitimate expenditures of the Government at the cost of yielding their opinions and their judgment upon matters improperly associated with the bills to furnish the Government with the money that it needs.

I recognized in this bill the re-enactment of this other legislation, and I wanted to know from my friend from Maine precisely why it was put on. If, as he states, it is merely put on for the purpose of facilitating the consideration of the question and obtaining the opinion and the consent of the other House to this matter and not put on for a coercive purpose of intimating that we must have these ships or the officers of the Navy shall starve, that removes the objection I would otherwise have to the amendment. I still believe, I say it very respectfully, that there is naught in my friend's argument that this is not new legislation. You may call it general or special; it is new. It is not the Navy as it is, but the navy to be created by law in futuro, and it calls for money not necessary to supply either pay or equipment or anything else.

Therefore, it is not strictly an appropriation bill with this ingrafted upon it; and yet I believe under the rules it is in order. That is the result of my examination of the rules; but I am also relieved from the other idea that it is put on in a minatory way for the purpose of saying, "You must yield your view, if you have a view contrary to that of the Senate, or else the Navy shall not be supplied."

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I shall not abuse the patience of the Senate, but I wish to say a very few words in reply to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and in perfect frankness in regard to questions that are pending in this bill. I have endeavored in whatever I have said about the policy of the Navy Department to avoid any gross insinuations or statements as to the Secretary of the Navy. I dislike such personalities. I think that his position and mine should demand a degree of courtesy and an abstention from anything that would savor of abuse or injustice. What I have said about the Secretary of the Navy was predicated upon my honest opinion in regard to him, in which I think I am warranted by his career and antecedents as a public man. Those antecedents and that career have been discussed freely in the Senate, and I shall not go into what was said in executive session. The Secretary of the Navy is no unknown man. He has been an applicant for other positions besides the one that he holds to-day, and his antecedents and character have been fully discussed.

I say once for all that my opinion of the Secretary of the Navy is that while he is a man of great ability, of unquestionable public courage, his personal feelings and his partisan bias would lead him to do things in a public capacity that I do not think would be warranted by the interests of the country. That is my honest and deliberate judgment. I meant to say this and to say nothing more, and that is the reason why I have expressed a want of confidence in him.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not say that in the administration of the Navy Department he believes that the Secretary of the Navy has done everything of that kind?

Mr. VEST. I am not able to say that he has done it; I could not put my finger upon one single act of his administration which would even subject him to criticism; but I mean to say that that is my general opinion based upon his antecedents as a public man. I shall not go into detail in regard to those antecedents unless some Senator challenges the statement, and then I can give my reason, I think, so explicitly that there can be no question about it.

As to Mr. John Roach, I have never assailed Mr. Roach except as the representative of a system that I believe to be fatal to the merchant marine and the Navy of the United States. He is a man of great ability; he is a man of surpassing energy. I have met him at different times when I was serving upon committees, and he appeared there in the enforcement of his views. I have simply assailed Mr. Roach, if it be assailing, because I recognize in him the embodiment of the navigation laws which I believe are destroying the commerce and the merchant marine of the United States; and that is all of it.

There is another thing I wish to say, and then I shall have nothing more to say in this debate. The Senator from Maine criticised very closely, not to say harshly, what I said in regard to the expenditure of $385,000,000 for naval purposes. Some Senator told me that I said since 1861 this expenditure was made. It was made since 1866.

Mr. HALE. I supposed it was within the last twenty years. I presumed the Senator intended to cover the time since the war.

Mr. VEST. Since the war.

Mr. HALE. I so understood him.

Mr. VEST. Since 1866 $385,000,000 have been expended for naval purposes. I have never said or pretended to say that a dollar even of the $385,000,000 went to the construction of a navy. That is exactly what I arraign the Republican party for to-day, as I have a right to do as a Senator of the United States and a member of the opposing party. I arraign the Republican party to-day because, as the Senator from Maine, their exponent in this debate, says, they have spent $140,000,000 in paying officers when they did not have any ships. This town to-day is flooded with naval officers who have not a ship to go to and have not had for twenty years. The whole service is composed of barnacles—gallant men, brave men, scarred marine veterans, but what use are they to the country? They are marine ornaments around the corners at Washington, and that is the fault of the Republican party.

That is the issue I make plainly and distinctly. You have had possession of the country absolutely and illimitably since 1861. You can not say that you spent this $385,000,000 for vessels under the war pressure and made them out of green wood. Since 1866, with profound peace, you have spent $385,000,000, and when arraigned for it, and when asked where is the navy, you reply, "We have paid off sailors and officers." For what? You have kept sailors and you have kept officers, and you have built no ships; to-day your seaboard is defenseless, and now the Navy of the United States is a mere by-word and a matter of derision and reproach the world over.

Mr. HALE. What is the Senator's remedy?

Mr. VEST. I have tried to give the remedy. The Senator talks about a picayunish policy. Let him introduce a bill here appropriating $20,000,000 to build first-class ironclads and I will vote for it. Let him build vessels that will face the Invincible and the Alexandra of the British Navy and the Lepanto of Italy. Let him come up to the changed conditions of the world. Instead of that, the organ of the Republican party and of the Committee on Appropriations tells us now, "We must have cruisers, commerce-destroyers." For what? He says England will not dare to fight this country as long as she can carry our commerce.

God forbid that any conflict should ever again come, either upon land or ocean, between the people of England and those of the United States, the two great countries of the world. I do not anticipate it; it is the last thing I should contemplate; but I do anticipate and contemplate the much greater mortification and national humiliation that a third or fourth rate power, with no commerce itself, should assail our seaboard and batter to dust our great cities. Suppose, as Admiral Porter says, that Spain to-morrow, in a complication in regard to Cuba (and she is complaining now that we permitted a vessel to escape from Key West to attack her dependents in Cuba) should declare war against this country, what would be the result? I will read you from the highest naval authority in this country. I read from the first man in the Navy. Admiral Porter says in his official report of November, 1883:

> If Spain, the least formidable of maritime nations, should go to war with us to-morrow, she would sweep our gradually increasing commerce from the ocean by setting afloat the large, swift steamers she could buy in Europe, and we could not prevent it. Our vaunted "home squadron"— > and the "six tugs," which one of our statesmen declared a great auxiliary to our naval force, would retire under Sandy Hook or the friendly guns of Fortress Monroe, and be obliged to look quietly on while we were being despoiled, unless they chose to add to the laurels of the despoiler by offering themselves up as a sacrifice to satisfy public sentiment.

Of which the Senator can talk so eloquently—

Would your cruisers destroy her commerce? What would the Chicago do then? It might raid a few orange or lemon ships. What would Spain care for your commerce-destroyers when she could send over here one of her first-class ironclads and batter down every city we have from Maine to Florida?

Admiral Porter alludes to Fortress Monroe. Not long since in a private conversation with one of the most distinguished Army officers of this continent we were discussing the very question that I have been attempting feebly to discuss to-day. We spoke of Fortress Monroe, and said he, "Do you know, VEST, if I were the commander of Fortress Monroe, in case of a maritime war and a foreign ironclad should moor in front of that fort what I would do?" said this gentleman, whose name is second only to that of General Grant; "I would take every soldier and every citizen I had inside of that fort and camp them outside to save their lives. The brick and mortar from exploding shells would kill every one inside of that old fort." Said he, "It is a mining machine and nothing else, built for a state of warfare which is no longer possible with civilized nations."

But the Senator from Maine says we must have these cruisers because we have nothing else. We are building two of them. What does Admiral Porter say about them? He says they are not war vessels and not fit for war.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no.

Mr. VEST. I have here his language. He says that coal is contraband of war, and that in case of a maritime war these vessels could not obtain coal; that they have not sail power enough to navigate the ocean as war cruisers, and the result is mathematical that they would be useless to us in the event of war.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has read the report, and he will not assert that Admiral Porter anywhere says that these are not war vessels or would be useless. The Senator may derive something by his own conclusion from some statement, but the Admiral, as I attempted to show by reading his testimony, is in favor of these ships and in favor of building more of them and going right on. If the Senator will turn to the latter part of Admiral Porter's testimony he will see it stated there very clearly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator from Maine will remember that Admiral Porter is in favor of giving full sail power.

Mr. HALE. There were some matters of detail, as that they ought to have more sail power, but that does not go to the substance of their construction.

Mr. VEST. I have here what Admiral Porter says in his annual report, made November 19, 1883, to the Secretary of the Navy. He censures the plan of the construction of these vessels on the ground that they are to be insufficiently sparred and rigged, and can not carry enough canvas to enable them to make fair speed independently of their engines. He calls attention to the fact that coal has been made contraband of war by the European powers, which would greatly detract from the service qualities of these vessels in time of war, as we are without proper coaling stations outside of our own boundaries, just as we are without everything else for the Navy. He infers that such fleet passenger steamers as the Alaska and the Oregon, mounted with a few powerful guns, would be very formidable in war as commerce-destroyers, &c. Then he says "the least formidable," &c., which I have read. Aside from this the Senator does not notice the statement of the highest authority in the world, the English Engineer, which states that these vessels are so constructed as to be absolutely useless. That may be too harsh a criticism, but it comes from the highest naval authority in Christendom. Yet we are asked, without having tested these two cruisers, without knowing whether this English and American authority is correct or not, to vote two million and a half more dollars to build two more cruisers, one dispatch-boat, and four gunboats.

The Senator says that it takes years to build one of these first-class ironclads; that it took seven years to build the Lepanto. Shall we ever build any unless we commence, whether it takes seven years or seventy years? Shall we ever have one of these first-class coast-defenders, not commerce-destroyers, but coast-defenders, unless we commence it? Does the Senator want money? The Treasury of the United States to-day is bloated with money. Does he want votes? My vote is ready. I will vote $50,000,000 if necessary for seacoast defense. I shall not vote one dollar to give more of these commerce-destroyers, as they are called, until we see what is to be the result of the two that are now being constructed. I shall not go in the face of Admiral Porter, I shall not go in the face of the highest naval authority in England, when at the very same time I know, when the Senator from Maine knows, that any fourth-class maritime power could send over here one of its first-class ironclads and batter down every city on the American seacoast and blow out of the water ever single one of the gunboats and cruisers that he proposes now to construct.

I have nothing more to say upon this question except to declare in the most solemn, emphatic, and positive manner that I am willing to go as far as the Senator from Maine or any public man in this country to protect the seaboard and then to build a navy that can maintain our flag and our honor in every port and on every sea. But I say in this question as in every other, I must see my way; and with my opinion of the Secretary of the Navy as a public man and with his antecedents, I shall not vote one single dollar under the circumstances for these cruisers unless it be under the most overwhelming necessity, immediate and imminent, and under limitations which are not found in the measure now before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question here?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator makes his statement, and I have no doubt with entire candor, that he wants to protect the country, and that he is ready to vote for anything that will do that. How is either branch of the legislative part of the Government to be so well instructed as to what is the advisable thing to do in this direction as by a carefully selected advisory board? We have had two of them, who considered all these subjects-matter, and then decided that the best thing to do is to build this class of ships. Admiral Porter in his testimony, which I have here, goes into that, and says the advisory board had been selected, made up of the best officers in the Navy, and that he is willing to trust them. The trouble will be that if each Senator or each Represeetative has a view that such and such a ship must be built and others must not be built, we shall never get anything done whatever.

Years have gone by and nothing has been done. The Senator says we have no navy, and he charges the Republican party with the fault that we have none. The Senator should bear in mind (I am not going to introduce any politics here) that for the last twelve years his party have had power in the House of Representatives half the time and here a portion of the time, but nothing has been done. I do not charge that as a fault or intimate that they are any more interested than we are, but just as much, both equally. Here is the first opportunity that has been taken, and taken deliberately, to do something for the Navy. It does not suit everybody, it is not a perfect plan, it may be, but it has been reached through a great deal of trouble and travail to get at it, and the naval authorities, having had the aid of the advisory board, a good board, have selected these methods. Now, can the Senator advise any better?

Mr. VEST. I have just this to say, that I have as much respect for the officers of the Navy as it is possible for any one to have personally, but I recognize the fact, and every Senator here knows it, that the vessels to which our naval officers incline are the cruising vessels. Not one of them wants to go on an ironclad to be put out at stations. That part of the service which has its charms is the part which gratifies their love of adventure and travel, visiting foreign countries, carrying the flag as a matter of display and honor. That is a very creditable motive, but what the American people want is no more show, no more display. The national dishonor to-day is that our cities are at the mercy of any maritime power in Europe. The Republican party has had this country without dispute for more than twenty years, and I have a right to ask them, what have you done with the immense resources put in your hands?

Suppose a British ministry should stand like the Senator does to-day with such replies to such questions as I put to him, how long would they retain their portfolios as ministers of the navy or of finance? The British people would put out of power any party that had brought them into any such condition as the Republican party has brought us in to-day in this country.

The Senator talks about the Democrats having been in power. Yes, we have had a good deal of it for a long time. We had here a little sporadical control of the Senate and the House, which lasted probably altogether three months.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And which will never occur again.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Vermont, with the spirit of prophesy upon him, says it will never occur again; yet I have known that Senator to be mistaken, great as are his intellectual attainments.

Mr. HALE. You had it six years in the House.

Mr. VEST. Six years in the House. What could we have done in six years in the House?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is what the country asks.

Mr. VEST. We could do nothing, because the Senate was against us and the President was against us and the Republican party declared all the time that we were there only for a day and made a large number of our people believe it. The greed for power and office has been so great and so absorbing on the part of our distinguished opponents and the energy arising therefrom is so great, that they absolutely make Democrats believe that we have no chance to succeed.

No, Mr. President, that will not do. To-day the Republican party is responsible for the condition of the Navy of the United States. Three hundred and eighty-five millions of dollars were spent for what? To pay officers who had no ships, sailors who had no duties, and the reply that is made to us now is, "You had the House of Representatives for six years and you ought to have done something."

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] rose as he indicated to protest against the discussion of matters not bearing directly on the subject before us; he urged us to adhere closely to the appropriation bill that is being considered, yet he spent an hour and a half, a much longer time, indeed, than was taken by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], in regard to matters that as far as I know have very little to do with the bill that he has charge of, certainly far less than the questions the Senator from Missouri argued so ably this morning.

His first attack was upon the Senator from Missouri, because he had said that the Republican party have spent $385,000,000 in naval appropriation bills since 1866. That is true. We had spent but $330,000,000 from 1791 to 1861, and had built up and maintained a very respectable navy during that period with that amount of money. He seems to desire an issue to be made as to the conduct of the Naval Department for the last eighteen years, and argued as if he was prepared to account for the proper expenditure of all that money from 1866 until the present time by showing from appropriation bills where so much went and where so much went, indeed where it was said it all went, according to the books. I tell him now that if he opens up all these questions as to how the money has been expended in the Naval Department from 1866 to the present time his appropriation bill will be pending after the Republican and Democratic conventions are held in June or July.

If he desires to know why the laws referred to by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] were passed in 1872 and 1873 he will find that it was because hundreds of ships belonging to the United States Navy were sold and absorbed in the Navy Department and no account given of them. If he wants to go into the discussion of that subject we can have a week's debate that will show rottenness and corruption and mismanagement and concealment of facts that would not be agreeable to him. I think I can prove it all by the speeches of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] when he was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the other House; I know I can prove it by the official reports. That is a subject that I did not suppose he desired to go into, although he has thrown down the gauntlet and appears to believe that it is a proper subject to discuss here.

He spent another half-hour in reading a very able brief, seemingly prepared by some attorney, showing the merits of Mr. Roach and his patriotic purposes in all his dealings. He does not know Mr. Roach, I think he said, but somebody has prepared for him a very elaborate brief of all Mr. Roach's doings and connections with the Government, which I am glad he has laid before the Senate. He has done this as though that was part of the appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. The Senator can find it himself. If he will go to the Department he will find it there.

Mr. BECK. I have no doubt the head of the Department is perfectly able to furnish it, considering all that has been said about his past relations with Mr. Roach.

Mr. HALE. Any clerk there can give it who has charge of or access to the records.

Mr. BECK. I am not going into any matter concerning Mr. Roach. I only assume if the Senator is anxious to proceed with the bill he would hardly have spent half an hour of what he calls the extremely valuable time of the Senate in reading a brief about Mr. Roach unless somebody was intensely interested in having that matter laid before us.

Nor do I know particularly, if the Senator was so anxious to press the bill and nothing but the bill, why the present Secretary of the Navy should have been lauded for another half-hour. About all these things, however, I have nothing particularly to say. I desire to return to the proposition the Senator started out with, that the Senator from Missouri had gone out of the way to argue questions connected with the merchant marine of this country on a naval appropriation bill, and warning those of us who were not going to leave the city that he would not expect us to do it. I desire to give him notice that I shall insist upon doing it if I deem it expedient, and I will show that it is legitimate in discussing this bill, because we need sailors quite as much as we do ships. You can not make a sailor in a day. You can not have sailors in numbers sufficient to fight our battles unless you have a merchant marine. They have been driven from the sea by bad laws and worse policy until 95 per cent. of the few sailors that are left are foreigners, and that of the most worthless class. That fact was so stated by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. We are paying other nations now $150,000,000 a year to do our carrying trade; 62 per cent. of it is carried in English ships, while we are helpless and defenseless.

Now, what is proposed? Not to allow us to have a mercantile marine, not to allow us to have sailors, but to have fast cruisers that will go out upon the high seas to hunt for prize-money and sink English merchant ships that have no guns, but are carrying our wheat, our corn, our cattle, our exports of all sorts that we are not allowed to have ships to carry them in ourselves. The ships the Senator and his friends are proposing to build are not expected to fight the ironclads or other war vessels of the world; they are not intended for use to defend the cities and coasts of the United States. That is to be confined to torpedo-boats, to ironclads, and to land batteries. But favored pets of the administration are to be put upon these grand steel ships and to be sent out to prey upon commerce, more than all else on our own goods on foreign ships, in order to secure prize-money for themselves. They are to be the Indian agents who are to stir up the strife and make the real soldiers do the fighting and then get all the profit.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark here?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I do not want the Senator to feel that I thought I could stop him if he wished to make a speech about free ships on this bill. I know I could not do that. Nobody could stop him from making a speech on any phase of the free-trade subject on any bill. He not only has the advantage of the Committee on Finance, of which he is a member, but of the discussions upon the educational bill; and now if, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations largely responsible for the course of business, he thinks that he ought to discuss free ships when within a few days a special bill touching that subject is coming up, I can not stop him. I can not stop him any more than I could stop the current of a great Niagara.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss that question now, but we are met with a proposition to build seven more cruisers upon an appropriation bill, and we are told the House can not be trusted to pass a bill that has already passed the Senate, and such is the anxiety of the Senator from Maine and his friends to have seven more cruisers, that a proposition to build them is to be put upon an appropriation bill upon the excuse that the subject is up, and he says we have the same right to provide for seventy new ships that we have to provide for seven. I suppose if the subject of rivers and harbors was before us the Committee on Appropriations could for that reason provide for all the rivers and harbors of the United States, or because a public building comes before us for an appropriation or a post-office or a custom-house, we can provide for all the buildings in the country on an appropriation bill for the same reason. When he goes beyond the ordinary scope of a bill providing for a sufficient sum of money to carry out the provisions of existing law and seeks, although a bill has passed the Senate and is now before the House, to put coercion on the House and bring it into a conference committee and get some two men there to agree with him against the will of the House by threats of defeating the naval bill if they do not agree to pass such new provisions of law as he desires, then instead of voting to build more cruisers that, as I said, are not intended to defend the coast nor the cities of the country, not intended to contend with foreign ships of war, not intended to give any protection to our own people, and at the same time proposes not to allow our people to buy a ship anywhere to compete with anybody else in carrying on necessary and legitimate commerce, I shall antagonize the proposition of building these new ships by seeking to build up a merchant marine which can be converted into a navy if needed, as we are to-day prostrate at the feet of the other nations of the world, almost without a ship, a sailor, or a gun. That is the way to build up commerce. It is the true way to build up a navy. The only way, I repeat, to train sailors for the navy is to build up a merchant marine of our own that will furnish us with fast ships, that will be better cruisers, better commerce-destroyers, if needed for that purpose, because faster than those that are now sought to be provided for. They will simply be used to send men out on junketing expeditions in time of peace and secure prize-money for them in time of war to which they are not entitled, as they will not aid in any real battles. The pets of the Navy will be put upon those cruisers; they will never hear a gun fired if they can avoid it, they will never be near our coasts and harbors when trouble comes, but will keep away from the war ships of the world; their only interest will be to stir up strife, so that they can keep clear of the big guns and do what they can to put prize-money in their pockets.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Kentucky listen to me for a moment?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was much interested in his statement of what a fine navy we had before what is called the late war and in what he has said about John Roach and contractors. I merely wish to contribute, without entering into the debate at this time, for the information of the Senate a statement in a letter from James Buchanan, then minister at London, dated the 5th of September, 1853, and addressed to Hon. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, on this subject of a navy. After speaking of sundry other topics of politics, &c., which are not germane to this question, Mr. Buchanan says:

> We boast loudly about our power and with justice upon our own continent; but what is our Navy compared with that of England or France? Suppose these powers or either of them should determine to prevent us from interfering in Cuba in case the time should arrive when we ought to interfere, have they not the naval power? We should at least have a navy sufficient to command our own coasts. Let the surplus money in the Treasury, or part of it, be applied to the construction of steamers, not under the superintendence of the old fogies, but by contracts with our best naval architects.

So that my friend from Kentucky will perceive that according to the opinion of Mr. Buchanan at that time the naval establishment of the United States was just about in the condition that it is unhappily now, and in his opinion the best way to remedy it was to put out by contract arrangements for building steamers, somewhat apparently in the way that is now proposed.

Mr. BECK. I do not presume that Mr. Buchanan or any one else supposed we had a navy equal to that of England or the continental powers or that we ever had an army equal to theirs, nor is it part of our system to keep up an army or navy equal to the great powers of Europe, who have to watch each other and maintain what is called the balance of power; nor does this bill propose to add one iota to the strength of our coast defenses nor to our naval armament for any purpose of resisting the ships of war that either England, France, Germany, Italy, or even Brazil could now make an attack upon us with. Nor will it do anything to building up our merchant marine, nor will it be a nursery for our sailors to any appreciable extent.

The one hundred and fifty millions that we pay every year to foreign nations under our present absurd laws enables England to feed, clothe, and maintain in active service 100,000 trained sailors at our expense, every one of whom is ready at her bidding to destroy our cities if she so orders. That $150,000,000, at $60 a ton, the average of steam and sail, would enable us to buy a merchant marine that would maintain 50,000 American sailors to meet her with. We are to-day prostrated, and it seems that it is objectionable even to suggest means of relief. When the cruisers we now propose to send out after prizes would attack English unarmed merchant ships, as they would have a right to do, with our goods on board, they would destroy more for us than they would for England.

We are beginning at the wrong end of the work, especially when we do not know whether the ships we are now building will be of any account even as prize-catchers.

All I propose to say now, indeed all I rose to say, is that I do propose if I think it best (and I will show a good reason whether the Senator from Maine likes it or not) to convince the Senate, I hope, and the country that we never will have American sailors, that we never will have the nucleus even for a navy upon the basis that he proposes to pursue by building ships that can not defend us against anything; but that we can become a naval and a commercial power by building up a great merchant marine from which we can draw sailors—a marine that can be converted into as good cruisers when needed as it is now proposed to build—for the purpose of carrying on our commerce; fast ships that will earn money for our citizens in time of peace, instead of squandering millions, as will be done under the provision that it is now proposed to make when we reach that portion of the bill, as we will some time to-morrow. I reserve the right to discuss that proposition, and I will consume less time in doing so than the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] did in reading Mr. Roach's brief and in telling how well the affairs of the Navy Department have been managed since 1866. I think I will make out a more satisfactory case in support of my proposition than he could in support of his.

FALSE PERSONATION OF GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GARLAND. With the leave of the Senator, let me call up a concurrent resolution from the House of some importance, which will take but a moment to dispose of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield for that purpose?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution received from the House of Representatives. It will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the enrolling clerk of the House, in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor, be directed to substitute the word "therefor" for the word "thereof" where it last appears in the Senate amendment amending the title of said bill.

Mr. GARLAND. The bill was passed by the House and came to the Senate. The Senate amended it, and it went back to the House. The House concurred in the Senate amendments, but the Secretary in engrossing the bill made the mistake alluded to, the word "thereof" instead of "therefor." This concurrent resolution is simply to correct that. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1565) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The bill (H. R. 4713) requiring the governors of certain Territories to be residents of said Territories at least two years preceding appointment was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 224) granting certain publications to the Cincinnati law library was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

AMENDMENT TO POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 9, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to submit for immediate consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill 1578, the same being "a bill to amend sections 1, 2, 3, and 10 of an act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, to regulate the removal of causes from the State courts, and for other purposes," approved the 3d of March, 1875, which said bill is now on the House Calendar with a favorable report from the Committee on the Judiciary, be made a special order for Saturday, the 12th of April, and from day to day until disposed of, not to interfere with prior orders or with appropriation bills, revenue bills, or bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to offer this resolution for present consideration. Is there objection? The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that the 12th of April has been set apart by order of the House for the consideration of resolutions in regard to the death of Mr. HERNDON, late a Representative from the State of Alabama.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I understand that; but this is a continuing order.

Mr. BISBEE. Would the gentleman from Texas have any objection to fixing a more remote date?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. This is a continuing order. I have no idea that the bill will come up on the 12th.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection to the consideration of the resolution, the question is on its adoption.

Mr. HENLEY. I would like to hear the resolution read again.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be again read.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to object to the resolution. [Cries of "Too late!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection comes too late. The Chair called for objection to the consideration of the resolution, and there was none. The Chair had stated the question on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman who has introduced this resolution whether he intends this bill shall come up in its order.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I suppose it will come up in its order. The resolution provides that it shall not interfere with prior orders.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is not the intention to jump over orders previously made?

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. No, sir.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD BRIDGE OVER SAINT CROIX RIVER.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee on Commerce the bill (S. 1797) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 554, to promote the efficiency of the General Land Office, be taken from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee on the Public Lands.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

WILLIAM B. MOSES.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 1148) for the relief of William B. Moses be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read twice, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SEWERAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHELLEY, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, as a substitute for H. R. 5465, a bill H. R. 6526) making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES GAS, ELECTRIC LIGHT, AND FUEL COMPANY.

Mr. SHELLEY, by unanimous consent, also reported back adversely from the Committee on the District of Columbia the bill (H. R. 1034) to incorporate the United States Gas, Electric Light, and Fuel Company, and for other purposes; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask unanimous consent to present at this time the petition of survivors of confederate prisons and late Union soldiers of the war of the rebellion praying for pensions. It is signed by 2,835 in Ohio, 2,545 in Illinois, 1,460 in Indiana, 2,275 in Iowa, 2,189 in Kansas, 2,645 in Pennsylvania, 483 in Minnesota, 233 in Missouri, 446 in Michigan, 349 in Wisconsin, 672 in Nebraska, 2,465 in New York, 333 in Connecticut, 176 in Massachusetts, and 780 in California, Kentucky, and other States and Territories; in all, 19,686. I would like to have the body of this petition—not the names—printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection; and the following petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, survivors of rebel prisons and late Union soldiers of the war of the rebellion, respectfully submit to your honorable body that in common with their fellow-soldiers, many of whom are drawing pensions, they endured the privations and hardships incident to army life, and in addition were subjects of cruelties before unknown in the annals of civilized warfare in the numerous prison-pens of the South, by reason of which they contracted disability, in many cases entirely debarring them from obtaining a living by manual labor, throwing them dependent on charity. Under the rulings of the Pension Office requiring the affidavit of an officer of claimant's company or regiment or two of his comrades, giving data as to contraction of his disability, also the affidavit of a surgeon or assistant surgeon of his regiment as to treatment for stated disability while in the service, nearly all occupants of rebel prisons and their legal survivors are deprived of the beneficent effects of the present pension laws. Thrown together, as your petitioners and their comrades were, by thousands in some prisons, from all loyal sections of the Union, oftentimes without previous acquaintance, without the means to make the necessary data for the continuance of that acquaintance after discharge, unable by death and removal to find the whereabouts of such comrades, if living, as they were in prison more intimately acquainted with, they find it impossible to comply with the requirements of the Pension Office.

We therefore pray your honorable body to enact, at your earliest convenience, a law which, while it will discourage and prevent fraud, will be less stringent than the present one on the honest claimant, and which will admit as evidence of sound bodily health the medical examination each recruit had to pass at enlistment; also as to disability at and since discharge, either medical testimony or that of near neighbors or intimate friends, and not requiring evidence as to time, place, and circumstances under which disability was contracted. In view of the atrocities known to have been perpetrated on all inmates of rebel prisons, the fact that claimant was an inmate of such prison or prisons being established, together with his own statement under oath, to be received as sufficient evidence as to contraction of disability as claimed. The same classes of evidence only to be required of widows whose husbands have died or may die of disease contracted in rebel prisons.

Pension in all above cases to commence at date of discharge from the service of the United States, rating the same as under present pension laws.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

PREVENTION OF COLLISIONS AT SEA.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the House Calendar and passed at this time the bill (H. R. 5692) to adopt the "revised international regulations for preventing collisions at sea." I will ask that the reading of the bill, which is lengthy, be dispensed with. The bill contains no legislation whatever beyond what is expressed in its title; it embraces not a syllable except these rules and regulations, which have been agreed to by all the maritime powers.

They can not be changed or altered by any one nation. They can not be changed by act of this Congress. This simply makes them statutory, as they have been in every other maritime nation. They go into effect next September.

The SPEAKER. The bill was read at length a few mornings ago.

Mr. ELLIS. I objected to that bill once before when unanimous consent was asked to take it up. Because it was so long I could not fully understand it, but now since I have read it I can say it is all right and I believe ought to pass.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is this a unanimous report?

Mr. DUNN. Yes; it is a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GIBSON. Does it contain any provision as to compulsory pilotage?

Mr. DUNN. Nothing at all. There is no change of the law in reference to pilotage. It contains nothing in regard to the navigation of inland waters. It relates only to navigation upon the high seas and the coasting trade, and is international exclusively. I will ask to have the report of the committee printed as part of my remarks explanatory of the measure.

There was no objection.

Report to accompany H. R. 5692.

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1387) to amend certain sections of titles 48 and 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels, have had the same under consideration, and report a substitute therefor.

The rules for preventing collisions at sea, which have been concurred in by every maritime nation in the world, without a single exception, are now statutory in every country in the world except the United States. They are international, and went into effect on the 1st of September, 1881, and now form a part of the law of the sea. It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that rules of this character govern the high seas; that no one country can alter them, and that ships of every nation are bound to observe them on the high seas, no matter what the municipal rules they may be governed by.

At the present time our merchant marine, although bound by this decision to observe and follow these international rules, have never been required to know and to obey them.

In the absence of legislative action by Congress upon this subject, a general order was issued by the Secretary of the Navy, in which the American rules were ordered to be followed by the Navy of the United States in American waters, and the international rules elsewhere.

The Treasury Department was invited to issue similar instructions for the government of the merchant marine, but did not do so, because it was found upon careful consideration that it had no power to formally authorize the adoption by the merchant marine of the United States of the new international rules of the road for preventing collisions at sea so long as the provisions of section 4233 of the Revised Statutes remained unchanged by Congress. So matters now stand.

It is evident that this condition of things may, and probably will, lead to difficulties between British and other foreign ships and ships of the United States. At present, for example, according to English law if a case was brought in a British court it would be decided according to the international rules, which have never been adopted for the government of our merchant marine and fishing fleet. These international regulations have now been revised by the board of trade of England, in pursuance of the merchant-shipping act, and these revised regulations for preventing collisions at sea have been accepted by the powers, and will be adopted and go into effect on the 1st of September, 1884, as will be seen from the following communication from the British minister at this capital to the honorable Secretary of State of the United States, and by him referred to Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN, chairman of this committee:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 29, 1884.

SIR: With reference to my letter to your committee of the 10th ultimo, urging the importance of legislative action in relation to the international regulations for preventing collisions at sea, I now have the honor to inclose herewith for your further information a copy of a note to this Department, from the British minister at this capital, from which it appears that it is desired to put the revised regulations in force on the 1st day of September next, if the approval of all the governments concerned can be obtained in time.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

FRED'K T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN,
Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

---

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 25, 1884.

SIR: With reference to my note of the 19th of August last I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the revised regulations for preventing collisions at sea, which have been drawn up by the board of trade in pursuance of the merchant-shipping act, amendment act of 1882. I am requested, in communicating these regulations to you, to state that the necessary steps will be taken by Her Majesty's Government for the adoption and circulation of the rules by the 1st of September next, to which date their operation has been further postponed in order that sufficient time may be afforded for their consideration by governments of the countries concerned.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir,

Your obedient servant,

L. S. SACKVILLE WEST.

The "revised regulations for preventing collisions at sea," transmitted by the British minister to the Secretary of State, are copied without change or alteration into this bill, and the bill contains no other regulations whatever.

Such rules as we have in the statutes for preventing collisions at sea are embodied in section 4233 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and are blended in a confused mass with the rules for the inland waters.

Your committee think that it is best to embody the "international rules" in a separate act or code in order to avoid confusion.

It is well said by a high naval authority that "rules for the high seas must be few in number and rigid in character in order that the whole world may act intelligently." The same rules must apply to our coast waters to prevent confusion; for there are no guides to the mariner to show him the boundary between American waters and the high seas, and he should not be obliged to use two codes except where the responsibility for a second or municipal one can be thrown upon local pilots. International rules not being subject to change or alteration by any one nation are, therefore, stable and permanent. But rules for inland waters of necessity must be subject to frequent changes and modifications as conditions of navigation alter. Therefore, separate codes are necessary.

The code for the inland waters already exists in section 4233 of the Revised Statutes, requiring an amendment of its first clause only to limit it to harbors, lakes, and inland waters, which is provided for in another bill, which your committee have recommended. That result, however, is practically accomplished by the passage of this bill.

Your committee call especial attention to the following interesting and instructive communication upon this subject from Lieut. E. W. Very, United States Navy, to the Secretary of the Navy, dated January 26, 1882:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
January 12, 1882.

SIR: In your last annual report to the President of the United States you called attention to the immediate necessity of legislation with regard to the present international regulations for preventing collisions at sea, and, in view of certain measures that are now before the Committee on Commerce, and since I believe that it was through my instrumentality that the neglect of the Government to take action on this important subject was brought to public notice, I take the liberty of submitting for your consideration information with regard to it which I consider of great importance at the present time.

First. As to the importance of immediate legislation on this subject.

The rules for preventing collisions at sea, which have been concurred in by every maritime nation in the world, without a single exception, that are now statutory in every country in the world except the United States, and which went into effect on the 1st of September, 1881, now form a part of the law of the sea. The recorded decision of the United States Supreme Court is that rules of this nature govern the high seas and that no one country can alter these rules, that ships of every nation are bound to observe them on the high seas, no matter what municipal rules they may be governed by.

At the present time our merchant marine, although bound by this decision to follow these rules, have never been required to know and to obey them. That this lack of knowledge works great harm to our commerce is clearly shown by the two following examples, taken from a number which may occur:

1. The American rules for the exhibition of lights by a vessel at sea when disabled or not under control are entirely different from the international rules. Therefore our merchant vessels are liable at a time of utter helplessness to be sunk by collision, involving perhaps the destruction of the colliding vessel in addition; and in such a case not only has the United States no redress, but it will be held culpable throughout the courts of the world.

2. The international rules for lights to be carried by fishing vessels are quite different from the American ones. Our fishermen are constantly engaged in the off and in shore fisheries of the Newfoundland Banks, where the English keep up a rigid and by no means friendly patrol. Our vessels are therefore at all times liable to libel for violation of these rules, and to an amount more than sufficient to absorb the entire profits of a season's work. Moreover, their fishing leads them directly into the lane routes for the transatlantic steamers, and they are placed in great danger of being run over and sunk.

Nearly if not more than three years ago the United States notified the British Government, which had the matter in charge, that it concurred in the rules and would take action thereon. The Government is therefore pledged to the performance of this duty, not only by its distinct assertion, but by the common law of humanity and the necessity to act in concert with the world in the development of a law of the sea.

Second. As to the history of the case in this country.

In 1879, while in England, I found in a small almanac a condensed statement of these rules with the notice that sixteen of the most important maritime nations had agreed to adopt them, the United States being one of them. On my return, shortly afterward, I applied at the Navy Department for a copy of the new rules, and, to my surprise, found that no knowledge of any such regulations existed. I was authorized to make an unofficial inquiry with regard to the subject, and found that in 1877 the British Government had corresponded with the United States on the subject. The correspondence had been submitted by the State to the Treasury Department, and the latter, after having suggested a few minor alterations, which were not concurred in by the Government of Great Britain, had agreed to adopt the rules as they stood. Here the matter had stopped, and I discovered that no one, as far as I could learn, in the Treasury Department knew anything about it.

I was then ordered by the Secretary of the Navy to draw up a brief giving all the information with regard to rules of the road necessary for the information of Congress. This I did, and the brief was submitted to Congress in a letter from the Secretary in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives. An attempt was made to secure legislation on the subject, but it failed. After Congress adjourned I suggested that there was a way in which, without legislation, the Navy might be placed in accord with the new rules. A general order was issued in which the American rules were ordered to be followed in American waters and the international rules elsewhere. The Treasury Department was invited to issue similar instructions, but did not do so. The only thing done was to give general information to our merchant captains that such new rules existed. Thus matters stand now.

Third. As to the remedy for this confused state of our rules.

The rules for preventing collisions at sea are embodied in section 4233 of the Revised Statutes. These rules, although international—declared so by the Supreme Court, and the ruling having been made in that court that no one nation could alter them—have been frequently amended, and in some places the meaning has been completely changed. Furthermore, when these rules were transferred to or embodied in the Revised Statutes a clerical error was made in rule 1 that destroyed the whole intent of the rule and has been a subject of constant legislation ever since. In no case has such legislation devised a proper remedy, although originally the rule was perfect. This error consisted in writing the words "steam-vessel" instead of "vessel under steam."

I respectfully suggest that since these rules are now, by force of universal action, only municipal in character, they be given that character in the statutes. I would recommend that the new rules be introduced as a new section of the Revised Statutes, and that, in order that no confusion may arise, they be made applicable to the government of United States vessels everywhere, except in the inland waters of the United States, for this reason: Rules for the high seas must be few in number and rigid in character, in order that the whole world may act intelligently. The same rules must apply to our coast waters to prevent confusion, for there are no guides to the mariners to show him the boundary between American waters and the high seas, and he should not be obliged to use two codes, except where the responsibility of a second or municipal one can be thrown upon local pilots.

In contradistinction to this, rules for inland waters must be subject to frequent modification as conditions of navigation alter. They can not be made applicable to the high seas except by accident; therefore a separate code is necessary, and this code already exists in section 4233, which needs only to be limited in its operation.

I respectfully suggest that the whole object may be accomplished by the following amendment to the preamble of section 4233:

"The following rules for preventing collisions on the water shall be followed in the navigation of all vessels within the harbors, lakes, and inland waters of the United States."

In adopting the rules for the high seas I respectfully suggest that the preamble of the section introduced should read:

"The following rules for preventing collisions at sea shall be followed in the navigation of all public and private vessels of the United States upon the high seas, and in all coast waters of the United States, except such as are otherwise provided for."

I finally respectfully call your attention to a slight alteration in the wording of the international rules that does not in any way alter their meaning, but makes it clearer, and is in strict conformity with United States admiralty law. The word "steamship" should be changed to the phrase "ship under steam" in the following places: Article III, opening clause; Article IV, opening clause; Article XII (a), opening clause; Article XII (c), opening clause; Article XVII, the two places where the word occurs; Article XVIII, opening clause.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD W. VERY,
Lieutenant, United States Navy.

Hon. WILLIAM H. HUNT,
Secretary of the Navy.

This subject was constantly and urgently pressed upon the attention of Congress by the Navy Department during the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses. (See Ex. Doc. No. 55, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, and Ex. Doc. No. 160, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, which contain all the correspondence between this and the British Government on the subject and the various communications to Congress from time to time.)

In response to a resolution of the House of Representatives passed on the 9th of January, 1880, requiring the Secretary of the Navy to report to the House "the rules prescribed by the Navy Department for the guidance of naval vessels at sea, whether in his opinion the same are in conflict with the existing rules for the guidance of merchant vessels," the Secretary made the following report to the House, which will be found to contain a very instructive history of this wise international policy. The papers referred to in his report are omitted.

Your committee earnestly unite in recommending the immediate passage of the bill herewith reported.

[House Ex. Doc. No. 55, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.]

Letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives, rules for the guidance of naval vessels at sea.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 22, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the resolution of the House of Representatives passed on the 9th instant, which requires the Secretary of the Navy to report to the House "the rules prescribed by the Navy Department for the guidance of naval vessels at sea; whether in his opinion the same are in conflict with the existing rules for the guidance of merchant vessels; and, if so, wherein such a conflict exists; and also what measures are in his opinion necessary to be taken to establish a system of international rules which shall apply to all naval and merchant vessels at sea," and in compliance therewith to submit the following report:

Although certain principles with regard to the conduct of vessels meeting and passing each other at sea, common to all maritime nations, may be traced back almost as far as marine commerce itself, the attempts to embody these principles into rules for national or universal observance is of comparatively recent origin.

As far as the naval vessels of a country are concerned, these principles are found embodied in regulations which are centuries old and which form elements of the science of naval tactics. These regulations, however, in former times had little, if any, legal control over vessels of the merchant marines.

As commerce increased in extent and importance and as the control of vessels of the merchant marines passed from the hands of owners to those of local boards of trade, and from those of local to those of national boards, we find different nations introducing these rules as statutes for general observance, and as the science of maritime law became developed and the absolute freedom of the high seas came to be acknowledged by all maritime nations the necessity for some universal law for the guidance of vessels on the ocean became apparent.

The first movement toward establishing some universal law seems to have been made about the year 1842, the Government of Great Britain taking the initiative. In this year the British admiralty issued a set of orders prescribing certain lights to be used at night by all British vessels; the same order made a steering rule applicable to all British vessels that had previously been a board-of-trade rule only, and which was generally known as the "law of the port helm." These rules were not formally submitted to other nations, but before 1844 the majority of the maritime nations of the world had adopted them either in whole or in part. In the United States they were adopted by the Navy Department only, appearing verbatim in a general order to all United States vessels.

The law of the port helm was, however, very faulty, and in 1852 the British admiralty issued instructions, under the authority of an act of Parliament, to a committee composed of officers of the royal navy and an elder brother of the Trinity House, to examine and report upon them.

In consequence of the condemnatory report of this committee, a second committee was organized by act of Parliament, composed of officers of the royal navy, elder brethren of the Trinity House, and members of the board of trade, to frame laws for preventing collision at sea. These laws were submitted to Parliament in 1862. They were made statutory in Great Britain, and all other maritime nations were invited to examine them in the interests of commerce at large, and, if found suitable, to legalize them.

In the course of the next two years thirty-four of the principal maritime nations of the world had approved and made statutory these laws.

In 1877, it having been found that these laws did not fulfill the requirements of marine commerce, an act of Parliament was passed authorizing an examination of them by a board similar to the previous one, consisting of naval officers, Trinity House brethren, and members of the board of trade. By this committee a revised set of laws was compiled and submitted to the government. The British Government submitted them to all the foreign maritime powers, and after sixteen of these powers had signified their approval of them and their intention to legalize them for national usage, the British Parliament made them statutory, to go into effect on the 1st of September, 1880.

It is thus seen that the present international rules for preventing collision are due entirely to the action of the British Government, and before entering into a discussion of the actions of our own Government, it is necessary to examine more closely the methods by which Great Britain arrived at the desired results.

Every nation has a right to make such municipal laws as it sees fit; therefore the right of the British Government to force the use of certain lights on board its naval and merchant vessels is unquestionable.

The British admiralty (corresponding to the United States Navy Department) issued the first instructions binding upon all British vessels, and upon reference to British authority it is found that previous to and for some time after 1842 the admiralty had a certain control over the merchant marine, which included matters of this general description.

It will be noticed that the first revisory board was made up of naval officers and a Trinity House brother.

Referring again to authority, we find that between 1842 and 1859 all pilot regulations were placed under the control of the Trinity House, and these light and steerage rules were considered to come within the limits of pilot law. Therefore the controlling Departments of the Navy and the merchant marine were both represented on the committee.

In 1862 we see the new rules framed by a committee of naval officers, Trinity brethren, and members of the board of trade. Again, by reference we find that in 1854 the British merchant marine was placed under the directions of the board of trade, the pilots remaining under the Trinity House. Thus, again, the whole marine was represented.

The new rules having been made statutory, were submitted for approval to foreign governments, and it was stated that all foreign ships who were guided by these rules should be treated as British ships in British courts of law. All the principal nations of the world approved and legalized these laws, and immediately the laws or rules changed their character. From being municipal laws, as enacted by Great Britain alone, they became, by the force of the common consent of commercial nations, an integral part of the law of the sea. It is not out of place to quote here an extract from an opinion on this self-same subject delivered by Mr. Justice Strong in the Supreme Court of the United States (14 Wall., 188):

"When we find such rules of navigation accepted as obligatory rules by more than thirty of the principal commercial states of the world, including almost all which have any shipping on the Atlantic Ocean, we are constrained to regard them as in part, at least, and so far as relates to these vessels, the laws of the sea. Undoubtedly no single nation can change the law of the sea. The law is of universal obligation, and no statute of one or two nations can create obligations for the world. Like the laws of nations, it rests upon the common consent of civilized communities."

It is stated that in 1877 the British Parliament authorized an examination of these laws, and the result of this examination was the compilation of a revised set of laws, which have been made statutory in Great Britain. Let us examine the mode of procedure in the light of the Supreme Court decision above quoted.

The proclamation declaring these revised rules statutory tells the whole story, and the following extracts are sufficient:

"And whereas the admiralty and board of trade have jointly recommended to Her Majesty that the regulations contained in the order in council * * * shall be annulled, and that there shall be substituted * * * the new regulations; and whereas it has been made to appear to Her Majesty that the governments of the several foreign countries mentioned * * * are respectively willing that the regulations * * * shall apply to ships of the said countries, respectively, whether within British jurisdiction or not: Now, therefore, * * * ."

Here we see a distinct acknowledgment of the necessity of consulting foreign nations before changing rules which Great Britian itself had made. This proclamation declaring the new rules statutory was not made until the approval of sixteen of the principal commercial nations of the world had been obtained. Nothing could be more plainly implied. The rules of 1862 were first made statutory, and then submitted to foreign governments. Their successors were first submitted to foreign governments, and after their approval had been obtained they were made statutory.

I now turn to the consideration of the actions of the United States Government with regard to rules for preventing collisions.

In 1838 Congress enacted a statute making it obligatory for all steamers to carry one or more signal lights at night. In 1842 the United States Navy Department adopted for the guidance of naval vessels the British steering and light rules which had been enacted that year. In 1849 Congress enacted a statute obliging all merchant vessels navigating the northern and western lakes to carry the lights prescribed by the Navy Department order above mentioned.

In 1852 Congress authorized the appointment of nine supervising inspectors, among whose duties it was specified—

"That it shall be the duty of the supervising inspectors to establish such rules and regulations, to be observed by all such vessels (steamers navigating rivers only), in passing each other, as they shall from time to time deem necessary for safety."

In 1863 Congress enacted a law establishing "regulations for preventing collisions on the water," which regulations were in conformity with those submitted by the British Government for its approval. In that same year these regulations were established in conformity with the act of Congress as the guiding rules for naval vessels by general order No. 34, issued by the Secretary of the Navy, which order has never been annulled or modified.

In 1865 the statutes with regard to supervising inspectors were so amended as to empower them to make steering and light regulations for all American vessels.

In 1874 the United States Statutes at Large were revised and compiled under the title of "The Revised Statutes of the United States." In this compilation the regulations for preventing collisions were amended and appeared as section 4233.

In 1878 the British Government submitted for the approval of the United States a set of amended regulations for preventing collisions at sea. These regulations were approved by the Treasury Department for the United States Government, and the British Government was notified of this approval, and partially in consequence of this approval the British Government made them statutory.

In 1879 a bill was submitted to the consideration of the Committees on Commerce of Congress proposing certain amendments to section 4233 of the Revised Statutes. This bill is still under the consideration of the committees.

These having been the actions of the United States Government, it remains to examine the effects produced by them. Previous to the year 1863 all these actions were strictly within the province of municipal law. In that year Great Britain submitted her rules with the avowed intention of attempting to establish an international maritime law. These rules were approved by the Navy Department for the Government, and in accordance with its suggestions the rules so amended as to extend their force to United States inland waters were made statutory. In suggesting these amendments directly to Congress the examining officers encroached upon the specific duties of the supervising inspectors, who, as shown above, made regulations for inland waters. They furthermore failed to comprehend the strictly international signification of the rules in recommending them for inland waters, although it was plainly evident that in certain places local regulations might be necessary which would interfere if not conflict with the rules for the sea. This point was even made by the British Goverment in subsequent correspondence. No notice, however, was taken of it, and the British Government in a circular shortly afterward issued to all governments, naming those powers who had approved the regulations, mentions the United States in the list, as follows:

"United States sea-going ships.

"United States inland waters."

Our Government being the only one in which inland waters are mentioned. In 1865 the Board of Supervising Inspectors, in conformity with the powers delegated to it by Congress, made certain pilot rules for lake and seaboard, and "pilot rules for Western rivers." The necessity for these rules is unquestionable, and in framing them it was necessary to depart in many particulars from the precepts of the general rules which had become international. The making of such rules did not imply any violation of the international rules, but no information of their enactment was given to foreign countries. Thus an act of discourtesy to all nations was done by the United States in leaving them to believe that the general rules applied still to our inland waters. Although naval vessels are constantly patrolling our lakes, seaboard, and Western rivers, no notification of the enactment of these rules appears to have ever been given to the Navy Department. This notification was a matter of prime necessity, as, since naval vessels are by statute exempted from the control of such municipal laws, the Navy Department should have been notified in order that proper and conforming regulations could be issued for its guidance.

In 1874 the regulations were inserted as section 4233 of the Revised Statutes, the wording having been amended. As long as the intent of the international rules remained unchanged and intact, the right to amend the wording was indisputable. But whatever power the Government may possess, it had not the right to in any way impair the signification of the international rules. (Vide Supreme Court opinion above quoted.) The wording of section 4233 is changed in many places. Omitting all changes that do not modify the intent, attention is called to the following points. In the second clause of the first article or rule the following difference of reading occurs:

International rule: "And every steamship which is under steam, whether under sail or not, is to be considered a ship under steam."

Statute rule: "And every steam-vessel, which is under steam, whether under sail or not, shall be considered a steam-vessel."

By this change it is claimed that the sense of the law is mutilated if not perverted; for by referring to the opening words of rules 18 and 19 we find, "If two vessels under steam are * * * ." The question arises, what constitutes a vessel under steam? This point is specifically answered in the international rule. It is not even referred to in the statute, and by the latter the claim may be set up that a vessel under steam and sail is not to be considered a vessel under steam. To landsmen this may appear a quibble, but it is by no means the case. A steam-vessel having the wind in her favor may set all her sails, and use only so much of her steam power as will overcome the resistance of the propeller to the water, in order to economize fuel. In this condition she is under steam and sail, but her steam power is not sufficient to control her movements. This is a condition in which naval vessels of all nations are very commonly placed, and merchant vessels frequently; and it is seen at a glance that in case of collision this question would certainly arise, and could only be decided by referring to the intent of the statute as expressed in the original rule.

It is objected to the statutory reading that it is in no sense a definition, as it reduces itself to defining a steam-vessel as being a steam-vessel when under steam.

Article XX of the international rules reads as follows:

"Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship, or the owner or master or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper lookout, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen or by the special circumstances of the case."

This article is of such importance that its precepts are found repeatedly quoted in admiralty opinions, yet it is entirely omitted from the statutes.

Rule 14 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

"The exhibition of any light on board of a vessel of war of the United States may be suspended whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, the commander-in-chief of a squadron, or the commander of a vessel acting singly, the special circumstances of the service may require it."

This is a complete precept affecting all the international light rules, but it is neither expressed nor implied in the original rules, nor does it appear in the latest authorized regulations of the Navy, although of application to naval vessels only. More than this, the rule itself is in direct violation of the principles of international law.

No matter what rights naval vessels may claim during war time within the jurisdiction of the United States, they can not jeopardize neutral life and property on the high seas. A defense founded on this rule in any foreign court or in courts of arbitration would not stand an instant.

The rules being originally intended to form an integral part of international maritime law, and as such having received the approval of the United States in common with the rest of the commercial world, it became not only a point of national honor, but one of necessity, in order to guard them against mischievous legislation, that they should of themselves form a single section of the statutes, from which all strictly municipal regulations should have been carefully excluded.

By reference to section 4233 it will be found that rules 6, 7, and 12 are regulations neither mentioned nor contemplated in the original rules. They are now and by their nature must always be municipal regulations, and however absolute the necessity for their existence may be they are out of place in the midst of international rules. The rules for preventing collisions having become de facto an integral part of international maritime law before the Revised Statutes were compiled, the above-mentioned examples clearly show that in approving section 4233 the United States Government did violence to the laws of the sea.

It has been stated that in 1878 the British Government submitted revised rules for the approval of the United States, and that the approval was given by the Treasury Department for the Government. In so far as the merchant marine was concerned, this approval was perfectly regular, provided that such approval originated with the board of supervising inspectors, in whom lies the power delegated by Congress to make regulations of this nature for the merchant marine.

That the approval did so originate is doubted.

There was no authority, however, for the Treasury Department to examine and approve these rules for the Navy. That an examination by the Navy Department was necessary is plainly evident from the fact that one of the new rules affects naval vessels especially. Leaving this special case, however, out of consideration, the fact remains that we have squadrons of naval vessels constantly cruising on the high seas and in foreign waters which must be guided by the law of the sea; therefore the controlling authority of these vessels should certainly be consulted with regard to amendments in the law which affect these vessels. Our manner of legislation upon this subject being thus proved faulty and injurious, the questions arise, To whom is the fault attributable? And how may it be remedied? The responsibility lies directly with Congress, but in a matter of this kind Congress alone is not competent to judge of the technicalities and must call to its assistance authorities on marine affairs. The fault originally must be placed at the doors of the Navy Department, whose officers, in 1863, having in their possession a knowledge of the methods adopted by Great Britain in framing the rules, approved of them arbitrarily for both the Navy and merchant marine. Had it not been during a time of war, when our sea-going commerce was almost totally destroyed, and when all such matters were naturally referred to the Navy Department, this general approval would not have escaped protest by the Treasury Department, and proper means for approving the rules would have been used.

Since amended rules have now been approved and legislated upon by fifteen of the principal maritime nations of the world, the present seems to be the proper time to remedy former faults, and to aid instead of obstruct the development of international law.

In seeking the remedy it is not out of place to refer to the actions of the British Parliament under similar circumstances. We find that invariably when it became necessary to legislate upon collision rules committees were formed as parliamentary advisers, in which the whole British marine was represented. First it was the British admiralty alone; then the admiralty and Trinity House; then the admiralty, the Trinity House, and the board of trade; and finally, when the rules became international, the marine authorities of the entire commercial world.

In the United States we have no national board of trade or national pilot control. The board of supervising inspectors, in a manner, possess the authority in regard to steering and light rules that is vested in Great Britain in the board of trade and Trinity House. It would seem that in appointing an advisory board, to properly examine the amended rules, a difficulty would arise in providing a fair and competent representation for the merchant marine, for the reason that although the power to make regulations with regard to lights and pilotage is vested in the board of supervising inspectors, the members of that board are not necessarily experts in general maritime affairs. The special function of the members of this board is the examination of marine boilers; and although the general control of pilotage matters is in their hands, the more immediate practical control is vested in local pilot commissioners.

The approval of the new rules by the Treasury Department having been improper, I would respectfully suggest that a re-examination of them be ordered by Congress, to be made by a committee representing the whole marine. A committee composed of the following members would, I think, meet the requirements:

Two naval officers: To represent the Navy.

Two supervising inspectors: To represent the merchant marine.

One revenue officer: To represent the revenue marine and act as adviser to the inspectors.

One pilot commissioner: Chosen from among the pilot commissioners of one of our large seaports, to represent pilot interests and act as adviser to the inspectors.

One naval officer: To represent the interests of international maritime law exclusively.

In this manner there would be three members chosen directly from the Navy Department, three from the Treasury Department, and one from a local control; all branches of marine interest would be properly represented, and matters of international import would be properly guarded.

I respectfully call attention to the fact that the United States Government is already committed to an approval of the new rules, and, as they have at this time become a part of international law, the Government is bound to act in accordance with all the precepts therein stated. The functions of the examining board would be confined to making such amendments of the wording as may seem proper and necessary. They are at liberty to enlarge the precepts, but not to curtail them.

I respectfully recommend that whatever rules be approved by this committee should be approved by the Navy and Treasury Departments before being submitted to Congress, and after being made statutory they should be brought to the notice of all foreign maritime nations who have already approved the amended British rules.

Very repsectfully,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the House.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEASING PREMISES FOR POST-OFFICE PURPOSES.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1508) to authorize the Postmaster-General to lease premises for use of post-offices for more than one year.

I ask to make a statement of about a minute long.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the statement?

There was no objection.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, this bill has passed the Senate and has been unanimously reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House, and it is earnestly desired by the authorities of the Post-Office Department, and for this reason: the Court of Claims has recently decided that the Government has no authority to lease beyond one year, or during the life of an appropriation bill. The result is that the Government is paying from 33⅓ to 50 per cent. more than private individuals for rent of buildings when they are obliged to make leases. It is a business proposition, and will result in a saving to the Post-Office Department. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of both Houses.

Mr. WELLER. What period of time does it provide that leases shall run?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. It provides that the Post-Office Department may lease such buildings up to a period of ten years, but leases will be rescinded when the premises become unfit for occupancy.

Mr. WELLER. I should like to ask the further question whether there is any provision for rescinding a lease when the Post-Office can rent on more advantageous terms?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. That provision is contained in the bill, giving that discretion to the Postmaster-General.

The bill was read.

Mr. YOUNG. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have been considering this question, and for the present I must object. I do not object to its reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. The subject has been considered by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of both Houses, and it is a matter especially belonging to that committee.

Mr. YOUNG. I must object.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. LOVERING. I ask by unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4592) to pay to employés of the Government wages hitherto withheld in violation of the eight-hour law, together with the accompanyng report. It was reported from the Committee on Labor under a misapprehension, as the subject was not referred to that committee, but to another committee.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

CORRECTION OF ENROLLMENT.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the enrolling clerk of the House in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under the authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor, be directed to substitute the word "therefor" for the word "thereof" where it appears in the Senate amendment amending the title of said bill.

ELLEN CALL LONG AND MARY K. BREVARD.

Mr. BISBEE. I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1233) for the relief of Ellen Call Long and Mary K. Brevard for present consideration.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I do not object to taking up the bill for reference to the appropriate committee, but I do object to its being taken up for action.

Mr. MILLS. There are a great many of such cases, and they ought to be considered in their order.

Mr. BISBEE. Let me make a few moments' explanation, and I am sure objection to the passage of this bill will be withdrawn. The House committee have reported unanimously on the same subject.

Mr. MILLS. As I have said, there are lots of just such bills on the Calendar.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The report of the committee of the House was not unanimous in this case, I think. Let it be referred.

Mr. BISBEE. Well, if I can not pass it, let it be referred.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PATRICK V. DOLAN.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution simply for reference to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay Patrick V. Dolan, out of the contingent fund of the House, a sum equal to the difference between the compensation received by him as laborer in the House Library and that as paid to the messenger in the House Library, at $3.60 per day from the 15th of December, 1883.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

PUBLIC LANDS, NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

On motion of Mr. PAYSON, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. 57) for the relief of the settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

TRANSPORTATION OF ANIMALS TO BE USED AS FOOD.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution for reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The resolution was read. It is as follows:

Whereas it is charged that the present system of transporting live-stock by railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce is barbarous and destructive, that 10 per cent. of the animals perish in consequence of this treatment, and the flesh of the remainder is rendered unfit for human food; and

Whereas it is charged that the flesh of animals so treated, including that of the dead and dying, is sold to the people, and can not when dressed be distinguished from sound meats, and is the source of many and various diseases; and

Whereas it appears by a report of the Committee on Agriculture of this House, January 21, 1875, that the loss by shrinkage alone in the weight of animals, caused by this system of transportation, amounted to the immense sum of $8,000,000 on the business of 1870, and must now be nearly or quite $16,000,000 per annum; and

Whereas it has been charged that said railroad companies, by a system of favoritism, give to a small number of persons known as the Association of Eveners a bonus or gift of about $15 upon every car-load of beef cattle shipped from West to East, said sum being no part of the actual legitimate cost of transportation, but is on the contrary collected by the transporters and paid over to the so-called eveners as a mere gratuity; and

Whereas the losses and charges alone constitute in the aggregate an enormous tax upon a necessary article of food, which must be borne by producer and consumer alike, diminishing the just profits of the meat-growers in the West and placing meat-food in many instances beyond the reach of the poor man in the East; and

Whereas it is charged that the act of Congress requiring railroad companies to unload stock in transitu at least once in every period of twenty-eight hours to be fed, watered, and rested, unless carried in cars in which the animals are adequately fed, watered, and rested without unloading, is habitually violated: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire whether these evils do in fact exist, and to what extent they may be remedied by law, with power to send for persons and papers, and with directions to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

GUANO ISLANDS.

Mr. HITT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 874) to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes, title 72, in relation to guano islands, for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. HITT. That bill, Mr. Speaker, has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of two Congresses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first ask if there is objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WELLER. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BISBEE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 421 for reference to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, unless that be withdrawn, will prevent the request of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BISBEE. I insist upon the regular order.

UTAH AND NORTHERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will determine whether or not it presents a question of privilege.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 6333, granting right of way to the Utah and Northern Railroad Company, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman hold that it was an erroneous reference of the bill under the rules?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir. I will send the bill up.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to know what it is.

Mr. VALENTINE. I will ask that the bill be read.

Mr. BELFORD. Unless the members of this House can have an hour every morning for the consideration of bills, I will object to every bill by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska submits this as a question of privilege. The Chair will cause the bill to be read, to determine whether it presents a matter of privilege or not.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. BELFORD. I object to that change of reference.

Mr. VALENTINE. Let us have a vote upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, as the Chair understood, claimed that it was a matter of privilege.

Mr. VALENTINE. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this bill was presented for the purpose of obtaining the right of way for this railroad company through the National Park. It is to make a connection with the Northern Pacific Railroad and the Union Pacific Railroad through the National Park. It is identically the same thing asked for by House bill——

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. I ask whether that was a proper reference in the first instance under the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is endeavoring to ascertain. If it was properly referred, the resolution is not a matter of privilege. If it was improperly referred in the first instance, it is a matter of privilege according to decisions heretofore made by the House on a submission of the same question.

Mr. VALENTINE. The only object I have in asking this change of reference is this: that it is a matter which should be determined by the Committee on the Pacific Railroads. A bill was introduced and referred to that committee on the 29th of January granting the right of way to the Cinnabar and Clark's Fork Railroad Company, to connect the North Pacific Railroad with the Clark's Fork mines, introduced by the Delegate from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS]. That bill granted a right of way to this company through this identical reservation. It provided for making a connection through that reservation from the Northern Pacific road to the Union Pacific——

Mr. CASSIDY. That did not encroach upon the park, however.

Mr. VALENTINE. The effect is the same exactly as that proposed by the bill I have suggested.

Mr. CASSIDY. It merely entered in at one part of the park and went out at another.

Mr. VALENTINE. This is the same.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska to the fact that this bill, while it relates to the railroad and telegraph lines between the Mississippi River and the Pacific coast, which, if it were the only subject introduced by the bill, would take it to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, also relates to the lands of the United States, which, if that were the only subject, would take it to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. VALENTINE. The Committee on the Public Lands of course would have no jurisdiction of this matter, because the bill itself makes it subject now to the law upon that question. They have the right—these railroads—to go through the public lands of the United States under existing law. They have that right by simply filing a map of definite location. But, Mr. Speaker, they have no right under any existing law to go through a reserve, a park, a national park, or other public grounds of the United States reserved by the Government for park purposes.

The SPEAKER. Does not that take the bill therefore to the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. VALENTINE. I think not. But if the Speaker so decides I am willing to leave the bill where it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill might have been sent by the House under the rules to either one of those committees, because it relates to two subjects, over one of which the Committee on Public Lands has jurisdiction and over the other the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think both the bills of like import should have gone to the same committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not a matter of privilege?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Under the resolution adopted by the House on Monday this day has been assigned for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and Senate bills on the Speaker's table relating to the erection of public buildings.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What becomes of the unfinished business, the bill which was under consideration on Saturday, reported from the Committee on Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business was not a special order. The Chair will cause the resolution of the House to be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill from the Committee on the Public Lands was called up under a special order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first cause the resolution adopted on Monday to be read. It is not entirely free from difficulty, but the Chair thinks its execution can be called for as against the regular order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, April 9, 1884, be set apart for the consideration of such bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and Senate bills upon the Speaker's table relating to the erection of public buildings as the committee shall designate, and that this special order continue from day to day until all such bills on the House Calendar and the Speaker's table shall have been considered and acted upon by the House, not to interfere with appropriation and revenue bills and special orders heretofore made; and that in the consideration of each bill and its amendments not more than thirty minutes shall be consumed in debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. REAGAN. I propose to antagonize that special order by calling up the bill (H. R. 5461) reported from the Committee on Commerce for the regulation of interstate commerce.

The SPEAKER. That can be done. The Chair will state in regard to the unfinished business that if it had not been for the adoption of the resolution just read the unfinished business, being a report from the Committee on the Public Lands, would have come up as the regular order this morning. But that resolution displaces the regular order and excepts nothing but special orders previously made and bills making appropriations and revenue bills.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But does it displace a prior special order?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I allude to the special order under which the Committee on Public Lands presented that bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBOTT. Does that special order set aside the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It does. It is an assignment of a day subject only to certain exceptions which are enumerated in the resolution.

The Chair will state in response to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that the bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands was not a special order, but it was called up under a resolution of the House which gave to that committee the privilege to report at any time for consideration, and it stood precisely on the same footing as an appropriation bill or a bill raising revenue, which bills may be reported at any time, under the rules of the House, for consideration.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This is a continuing special order, and it takes precedence of all other business of the House for to-day, does it?

The SPEAKER. Except special orders theretofore made and appropriation bills and bills raising revenue. And whenever a gentleman calls up a special order previously made the House must determine not to consider that before it can go on with the business under this resolution.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. My inquiry is if the present ruling of the Chair excludes committees from making reports this morning?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. REAGAN. I propose to antagonize the special order made by the resolution of the House on Monday with the prior special order, the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce.

Mr. MILLS. As I understand, those who vote "ay" will vote to take up the special order for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had better state the question. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] calls up a special order made before the passage of the resolution with reference to the bills reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Under the rules of the House the question must be first taken on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to take up the special order which he has indicated. Those who vote "ay" will vote to take up the bill indicated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. A special order has been made by the House for the consideration of the bill to relieve American shipping. That order was made for the 13th of March, to continue from day to day thereafter. The bill which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] proposes to call up was made a special order for March 18. Would not a motion be in order at the present time to proceed with the consideration of the prior order, the bill for the relief of American shipping?

The SPEAKER. That bill can only be reached by moving to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider that order, and that motion would have precedence over the special order called up by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move, then, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the special order, the bill (H. R. 2288) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, a bill which has stood at the head of the Calendar for more than two months.

Mr. REAGAN. I submit that that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. It is in order. The gentleman moves to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering a special order fixed for a day prior to the day indicated for the consideration of the bill to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] refers.

Mr. REAGAN. While the bill was set down to be considered at an earlier day than the one I desire to call up, the order for that was made after the order for the bill to which I refer.

The SPEAKER. The priority of the day fixed for the consideration of a bill determines the order of precedence, and not the day when the order fixing such date was made. For instance, if the House should make an order to consider a given bill on the 16th, and should subsequently make an order to consider another bill on the 15th, that would be a clear indication of the desire of the House to first consider the latter bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Both orders were made on the same day.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 2228) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, made a special order for the 13th day of March.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. DINGLEY; and upon a division there were—ayes 71, noes 82.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. DINGLEY called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 35 in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. That is more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. GUENTHER. I call for a count of the other side.

Those opposed to taking the yeas and nays were then counted.

The SPEAKER. Those demanding the yeas and nays are 35, those against it are 111. More than one-fifth having demanded the yeas and nays, they are ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. Before the roll is called the Chair asks leave to submit to the House certain personal requests.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROSECRANS, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, asked and obtained leave of absense for two days for himself and other members of the committee to inspect the soldiers' home at Hampton, Va.

Leave of absence was also granted as follows:

To Mr. CONNOLLY, until Saturday next.

To Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, for ten days from to-morrow, on account of important business.

To Mr. CUTCHEON, for two days.

To Mr. COX, of New York, for the remainder of this week, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCCORMICK, until the 21st instant.

To Mr. SMALLS, for fifteen days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FYAN, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, for one week from the 8th instant, on account of important business.

To Mr. HILL, for ten days, on account of important business.

PRINTING A BILL.

Mr. WILLIS asked and obtained unanimous consent that Senate bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, now on the Speaker's table, be printed for the use of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering House bill No. 2228, to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, made a special order for the 13th of March. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 76, nays 157, not voting 89; as follows:

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. CALDWELL, is detained at home on account of sickness

Mr. MCADOO. If I correctly heard the Clerk I was announced as paired with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] on all questions. My understanding is that I am paired on political questions only, and, therefore, I have voted.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will it be in order at this time to present, as an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Texas, the question whether the House will consider the unfinished business of last Saturday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The unfinished business would have been the regular order, but the regular order is displaced by the resolution adopted on last Monday.

Mr. PAYSON. But that subject having been up and its consideration having been entered upon, why can not the question be presented at this time?

The SPEAKER. Because the resolution of the House adopted last Monday assigns this day to the consideration of a particular class of business, with certain specific exceptions; and the unfinished business is not one of the exceptions. The Clerk will read the title of the bill which the gentleman from Texas moves to take up.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to take up this special order, and the question of consideration is raised against it. The question is, Will the House now proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read?

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER said: The noes appear to have it.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 120, not voting 100; as follows:

YEAS—102.

So the motion of Mr. REAGAN to consider H. R. 5461 was not agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. RYAN with Mr. BLACKBURN, on all political questions, until further notice.

Mr. KING with Mr. WADSWORTH, on all political questions, until further notice.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. STRAIT, on this question.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it not be in order at this time to raise the question of the consideration of the unfinished business before the House—the bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, under the resolution adopted by the House on last Monday.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to call the attention of the Speaker to the last branch of the resolution, providing for the consideration of business from the Committee on the Public Lands:

That the Committee on the Public Lands is hereby instructed to report to the House bills to carry into effect the views expressed in the foregoing resolutions; that said committee shall be authorized to report such bills at any time, subject only to revenue and appropriation bills; and the same shall in like order be entitled to consideration.

Now, would not an appropriation bill or a revenue bill be entitled to consideration at this time, notwithstanding the special order?

The SPEAKER. It would, because such bills are expressly excepted from the operation of the resolution of Monday last.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The order made by the House on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] provided that the committee on the Public Lands shall be authorized to report such bills at any time, subject only to revenue and appropriation bills, and then it goes on to say, "and the same shall be in like order entitled to consideration."

The SPEAKER. If it had not been for the order of Monday there is no doubt bills from the Committee on Public Lands, for the purposes indicated in the resolution the gentleman from Ohio holds in his hand, would have occupied exactly the same position as general appropriation bills and bills for raising revenue. But when the resolution was passed on Monday last the House thought proper to except appropriation bills and bills raising revenue from the operation of that rule, but did not except bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. But would the latter resolution, passed under suspension of the rules by the House on Monday last, rescind the order made with precisely the same sanction on the preceding Monday under suspension of the rules? On the preceding Monday the House, by the same vote of two-thirds, suspended the rules and made a special order, so to speak—that is, it certainly made a special order taking a given class of bills out of the general order, making them special and declaring they should have precedence, subject only to revenue and appropriation bills. Now, will a resolution adopted by the House on a subsequent Monday under a like suspension of the rules have the effect of rescinding that prior declaration of the House?

The SPEAKER. If the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands and heretofore under consideration had been itself a special order it would have been excepted from the operation of the resolution passed on Monday, but it was not a special order. It simply belonged to a class of bills having a certain preference by resolution of the House over other business of the House. The resolution of Monday is very similar to the resolution passed by the House during the present session, and usually passed at each session of Congress, setting apart a particular day or evening for the consideration of pension bills. This is precisely like the resolution on that subject except it makes certain specific exceptions, whereas the resolution in reference to the consideration of pension bills on Friday evening makes no exception; it sets apart a day, assigns it, dedicates it to the consideration of a particular kind of business.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But under the suspension of the rules this class of business of the Committee on Public Lands was made a special order, and was placed in the same category precisely with bills for raising revenue and general appropriation bills. Under that special order made by the House these land-grant bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands were placed precisely in the same category with appropriation and revenue bills. It seems to me, therefore, the unfinished business, being a report from the Committee on Public Lands in reference to the Oregon Railroad grant, was excepted. I ask for the reading of the special order relating to public buildings.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, April 9, 1884, be set apart for the consideration of such bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and Senate bills upon the Speaker's table relating to the erection of public buildings as the committee shall designate, and that this special order continue from day to day until all such bills on the House Calendar and the Speaker's table shall have been considered and acted upon by the House, not to interfere with appropriation and revenue bills and special orders heretofore made, and that in the consideration of each bill and its amendments not more than thirty minutes shall be consumed in debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This was a special order, made under suspension of the rules, by which all bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands of the character referred to were placed in the same category precisely with revenue and appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. That is the exact difficulty. The bill was not made a special order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But it was by a special order placed in that category.

The SPEAKER. It was not put in a particular place, but it was placed upon the same footing precisely with general appropriation and revenue bills. That is to say, the committee were allowed to report them at any time and to take them up for consideration at any time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask whether it is not in the power of the House to take a vote on the question of consideration as between those bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state——

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, it is known to the Chair the bills pending for the erection of public buildings and made the subject of a special order for to-day and from day to day until disposed of are bills which involve an appropriation of money out of the Treasury, and under the rules must necessarily have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

If the House should then refuse to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of such bills, would it not then be in order to proceed with the further consideration of the unfinished business of Saturday last?

The SPEAKER. It would be unquestionably, because the bills for the erection of public buildings are left by the resolution subject to the rule, which prevents the House from reaching them at all, except by taking a vote to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That rule of the House requiring bills making appropriations to have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was not changed by this resolution assigning days for the consideration of public-building bills. If, therefore, the House should refuse to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union these bills could not be considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. So I understand, that they could not be considered; and then if the House shall so vote, the bill forfeiting the Oregon land grant would come up for consideration.

Mr. MILLS. I call for the regular order of business. The Chair has already decided this question, and I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not be permitted longer to debate it unless he wishes to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

PUBLIC BUILDING, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I now move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 233) providing for the enlargement and improvement of the post-office, custom-house, and court-house at New Haven, Conn., with a view of moving that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this covered by the resolution?

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The House has not gone to the Speaker's table.

Mr. THOMPSON. Is it a privileged motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, under this resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the House must go to the business upon the Speaker's table in order to take up that business, and the House has not done so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the resolution adopted on Monday last the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is in order.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. The inquiry that I wish to make is whether the resolution passed upon Monday under a suspension of the rules did not provide that only such bills as were upon the Calendar reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and bills upon the Speaker's table should be taken up, and only by the action of the committee? Now, unless there has been action of the committee on this bill, I claim that it is not in order under that resolution.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I am acting under the direction of the committee in making this motion.

Mr. THOMPSON. Action by the committee has been taken upon this bill? There has been no official report from the committee. If there has been I should like to have my attention called to it. Does the gentleman desire its reference to the committee?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. No, I do not ask its reference to the committee, but that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. THOMPSON. Has the committee acted upon the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that no written report is necessary.

Mr. THOMPSON. This bill is not pending before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It has not been considered by that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would have the same right with reference to bills which are taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as with reference to those which are upon the Calendar, under the special order of the House heretofore adopted.

Mr. THOMPSON. But that resolution specified that the committee should designate the bills.

Mr. MILLS. My friend from Kentucky misunderstands the purport of the resolution. It authorizes bills reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and also Senate bills upon the Speaker's table to be taken up.

Mr. THOMPSON. Such as have been designated by the committee, as I understand it.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. That they shall be considered in the order as designated by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is in order under the resolution.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to take the bill the title of which has been read from the Speaker's table and refer it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; the House divided, and there were—ayes 85, noes 35.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

Mr. BEACH. Let us have the yeas and nays at once.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to ask if it will be in order at any time to refer this bill to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for a report; and, if so, at what time would it be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XIII.

* * * * * * *

2. The question of reference of any proposition, other than that reported from a committee, shall be decided without debate, in the following order, viz: a standing committee, a select committee; but the reference of a proposition reported by a committee, when demanded, shall be decided according to its character, without debate, in the following order, viz: House Calendar, Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Committee of the Whole House, a standing committee, a select committee.

The SPEAKER. This bill if taken from the Speaker's table would necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union upon a mere point of order. But it is also in order if the bill is taken from the Speaker's table to move its reference to any one of the standing committees or to any select committee that may be named. But the bill must be first taken from the Speaker's table before any motion to refer is in order.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand the motion is now to take it from the Speaker's table——

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. And refer it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. THOMPSON. Can the motion be put in that way?

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer to a standing or select committee would have preference of a motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, because the bill would go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, as the Chair has said, on a mere point of order.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then I ask for a division of the motion.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be on taking the bill up.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask for a division of the question. I understand the gentleman from Indiana to make a motion to take this bill from the Speaker's table and refer it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union all in one motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky desires to move its reference to a standing committee.

Mr. THOMPSON. No; to make a separate motion of each of the two motions submitted by the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires then to separate the motion: first, to take it from the Speaker's table, and then on the question of reference?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir. Then if the House decides to take it from the Speaker's table I would like to be recognized for a motion for its reference afterward.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is an independent motion which can be made if the House agrees to take the bill up.

Mr. THOMPSON. After the question of consideration is determined I can make that motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, because it would necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole on the point of order without a formal motion.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But an independent motion would be in order for its reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. It would if the bill is taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. In order to save the waste of time that this will evidently necessitate, I will withdraw the motion which I have made.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. If the gentleman wants to place himself in the category of obstructing public business I have no objection, but the responsibility must rest with himself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentlemen from Indiana has the right to withdraw the motion at any time under the rules of the House, before amendment or a vote upon it.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds upon the Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN. That brings up the direct issue between the public lands and the public buildings.

Mr. MILLS. It is an issue between the consideration of the business of this House by a majority of its members or its obstruction on the other hand by a minority.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. The gentleman can not put anybody in a false attitude by his statement.

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. When the question as to the order of business was presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], the Speaker's decision was not distinctly heard in this part of the House. My inquiry is this: If the House shall refuse to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bills indicated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER], would it then be in order to call up the unfinished business of Saturday last?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the only way to reach the consideration of the bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is to sustain the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER]. If that motion is not sustained the House will then proceed with the regular order of business, and the regular order would be the unfinished business, being the report of the Committee on Public Lands, which was under consideration at the adjournment on Saturday. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER].

The question being taken, there were—ayes 101, noes 47.

Mr. BEACH. No quorum.

Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 39 members voting therefor—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 160, nays 61, not voting 101; as follows:

YEAS—160.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

The names of members voting were read.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, with Mr. RUSSELL, for this day.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. Before announcing the result of the vote the Chair will submit some personal requests of members.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HEMPHILL, from Thursday, the 10th instant, to Monday, the 14th, both inclusive, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. GIBSON, for fifteen days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The result of the vote on Mr. STOCKSLAGER's motion was then announced as above stated.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills on the Calendar reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in relation to public buildings.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT KEOKUK, IOWA.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have directed me to call up first House bill No. 483.

Mr. THOMPSON. I object to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order. These are matters of importance, and I insist we shall have order while we are considering them.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Is it competent for the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to call up bills out of their order on the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. It is competent for him to do so under the resolution of the House which directs that such bills shall be considered as the committee shall designate.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. An objection to this bill of course carries us back to the House. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will first be reported by the Clerk, and the Chair will then entertain the objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 483) for the erection of a public building at Keokuk, Iowa.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building with fire-proof vaults therein for the accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices in the city of Keokuk, Iowa. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $150,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Iowa shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of the State and the service of civil process therein.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON], who stated that he objected to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state on what he bases his objection?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not necessary under the rule to do more than object to the consideration of a bill in the Committee of the Whole. When objection is made to the consideration of any bill the rule provides the committee shall immediately rise and report such objection to the House, and the House shall decide whether the committee shall consider the bill or not. The resolution adopted under a suspension of the rules the other day did not suspend that rule. The resolution provides that this day is set apart for the consideration of these bills; but they are to be considered under the rules of the House and not in opposition to the rules of the House. And the rules of the House provide that when the House is in Committee of the Whole if objection is made to the consideration of a bill, the objection shall be reported to the House and the House shall direct the committee as to the order of consideration.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I submit to the Chair that we are considering these bills under a special order of the House which provides that such bills shall be taken up as they shall be designated by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. THOMPSON. Under the rules of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I beg the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] to remember in that connection that while it is true that a special order was made for the consideration of these bills, and that special order was passed under a suspension of the rules, in the consideration of those bills the rules of the House are no further suspended than by the direct terms of the resolution making this special order. The rule to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] has referred was never suspended by that order. The method in which we shall proceed in the consideration of those bills was not changed except that thirty minutes only for debate is allowed on each bill and amendments thereto.

Mr. MILLS. I beg the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] also to remember that by the very terms of the resolution adopted by the House on Monday last, as has been heretofore ruled, I think once by Speaker Blaine, every rule of the House is suspended, and the order of the House as embraced in the resolution is the rule of the House upon the subject, is the rule controlling the order in which those bills are to be considered. The resolution adopted on Monday was mandatory—that these bills shall be considered in the order designated by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. That resolution is the order which the Chair, as presiding officer of the Committee of the Whole, is now to execute.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has allowed his zeal to run away with his judgment. With all deference to him, if what he now states is true, that every rule of the House was suspended by that order, then it would not be necessary for us to be in Committee of the Whole as we now are.

Mr. MILLS. We are in Committee of the Whole under that order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We are in Committee of the Whole under the rules of the House. The rules of the House have not been suspended except as provided by the direct terms of the resolution.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We are either to consider this bill which has been called up by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] under all the rules of the House or under none of them. If those rules of the House have all been suspended and the consideration of this bill is not open to the objection made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON], then we might also proceed to pass this bill without a quorum. Suppose that there should be a call for a quorum, the same argument would lie against that as lies against the right of the gentleman from Kentucky to object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] if under the resolution of the House a bill of this character can now be debated more than thirty minutes?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The House can fix the time for debate.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. And the House has done so.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The House has done so; but it has not suspended all the rules of the House, and the debate must go on under the rules. Every rule of the House is now in force except so far as they have been modified by the special order. We must have a quorum here to pass these bills, and if there is objection made to the consideration of any one of these bills we must under the rules go back into the House and let the House make order in reference to it. There is nothing in the special order that suspends that rule more than any other rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the resolution under which the House is now proceeding.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, April 9, 1884, be set apart for the consideration of such bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and Senate bills upon the Speaker's table relating to the erection of public buildings as the committee shall designate, and that this special order continue from day to day until all such bills on the House Calendar and the Speaker's table shall have been considered and acted upon by the House, not to interfere with appropriation and revenue bills and special orders heretofore made; and that in the consideration of each bill and its amendments not more than thirty minutes shall be consumed in debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. THOMPSON. If all the rules of the House were suspended by that order, then I would like to know why the Speaker of the House sent us into Committee of the Whole? If the rules were suspended by that order, then there is no need for us to go into Committee of the Whole to consider these bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that on motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, in pursuance of the resolution which has just been read. That resolution expressly designates the bills that are to be considered by the Committee of the Whole House; that is, "such bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds * * * as the committee shall designate." The chairman of that committee has indicated the bill which has just been read by the Clerk as the first bill to be considered under that order. The Chair holds that the consideration of that bill is now in order.

Mr. THOMPSON. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. THOMPSON. Is that open to debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. THOMPSON. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair, because I do not think that the resolution which has been read by the Clerk goes as far as the Chair has held it to go. If I understand the decision of the Chair, it is that the resolution which has been read not only compels the House to go into Committee of the Whole, but goes so far as to direct the Committee of the Whole as to the business which it is to consider.

Now, the resolution which has been read gives no direction whatever to the Committee of the Whole, but that committee is left to pass upon its business under the rules of the House. The suspension of the rules was only so far as to allow the consideration of this particular class of bills, to give them priority, and to fix the day upon which they should be considered, not by the Committee of the Whole but by the House. The House met, and has determined to consider that business. In what order is the business to be considered? The House has determined to consider this business in Committee of the Whole, and will consider it under the rules of the House, except in so far as the resolution itself suspended those rules and prescribed the order of proceedings.

The next question is, under what rules are these bills to be considered? A rule of the House prescribes that they shall receive their first consideration in Committee of the Whole. Therefore, pursuant to the routine of business prescribed by the rules of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] submitted his motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, and he is sustained by the House in going into Committee of the Whole.

When we get into Committee of the Whole the rules of the House, so far as applicable, must govern; this business of the Committee of the Whole must be proceeded with in the same way as any other business that might come before the Committee of the Whole, unless the resolution of the House prescribes a different course of proceeding. But there is nothing in that resolution which fixes a different order of business. The only change which the resolution makes from our ordinary rules is upon the subject of debate. Ordinarily, in the consideration of bills in the Committee of the Whole there is unlimited general debate until we go back into the House and the debate by a special order has been limited. Under the resolution adopted by the House with reference to this particular class of business we are limited to thirty minutes' debate on each bill; but that is the only change which the resolution makes in the ordinary rules bearing upon the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Is it not also provided that bills shall be taken up in their order?

Mr. THOMPSON. All bills in Committee of the Whole are taken up in their order except certain bills which are entitled to priority of consideration—bills raising revenue and general appropriation bills. Bills of this character are expressly excepted in this resolution; their right of priority is preserved.

Now, my point is that these public-building bills when considered in Committee of the Whole are subject to all the rules of the Committee of the Whole, except the rule which allows unlimited debate so long as no order of the House has been made cutting off debate. In every other respect the ordinary rules are in force. Under the ordinary rules, one objection to the consideration of a bill requires that the Committee of the Whole shall rise, and then the House shall determine whether this particular bill shall be considered or laid aside. I submit that upon one objection being made we are entitled to a decision by the House whether this particular bill shall be considered or laid aside. You can not deprive the House of this right, because the rule in that respect has not been suspended.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that the decision of the Chair upon this question is construed on the floor as being based upon a different ground from that which the Chair has announced. The ruling of the Chair, as I understand, does not rest upon the fact that the order of the House in this case was adopted under a suspension of the rules; it rests upon the terms of the order itself.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the ground upon which the Chair placed the decision.

Mr. KASSON. So I understood; but it does not seem to be so understood on the floor. By the terms of the resolution it is the order of the House that these particular bills be considered, and therefore it is not the right of any one member or any number of members to intercept the order of the House declaring that these bills, as designated by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, shall be considered. The decision of the Chair, I repeat, rests upon the ground of a specific order of the House to consider these bills, and therefore I think we ought to sustain the decision.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If I understand correctly, this is the fourteenth bill upon the Calendar. If these bills are to be considered in their order upon the Calendar, why should we pass over thirteen other bills to take up this one?

Mr. KASSON. That does not touch the argument. The House, by its order, has said that the first bill to be taken up shall be that indicated by the committee. We are acting under the order of the House; and whether it was adopted by a majority vote or a two-thirds vote makes no difference. I think the Chair is right in holding, and the Committee of the Whole should sustain the Chair in holding, that the order of the House is to be executed, whether we like it or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Inasmuch as there seems to be some misapprehension in regard to the ground on which the Chair based his decision, the Chair would state that he caused the resolution to be read; and the particular language on which he based his decision was this:

> That Wednesday, April 9, 1884, be set apart for the consideration of such bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and Senate bills upon the Speaker's table relating to the erection of public buildings as the committee shall designate.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But the special order does not require that these bills shall be considered in Committee of the Whole. So far as that order is concerned, they may be considered in the House. They are subject, however, to the point of order that the rules require their consideration in Committee of the Whole. The special order does not release them from liability to that rule. The House once in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this business, the ordinary rules of the Committee of the Whole prevail. I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] is entirely right. The House, not by virtue of the special order but by a vote, has determined to go into Committee of the Whole to take up these bills. We are now in Committee of the Whole in consequence of that vote of the House. Being in Committee of the Whole, we are subject to all the rules, one of which—Rule XXIII, clause 4—is in this language:

> In Committee of the Whole House, business on their Calendars shall be taken up in regular order, except bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, which shall have precedence, and when objection is made to the consideration of any bill or proposition, the committee shall thereupon rise and report such objection to the House, which shall decide, without debate, whether such bill or proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present.

How the special order does away with this rule any more than it does away with the rule requiring a quorum, I am unable to see. We are in Committee of the Whole by a vote of the House. These bills are to be considered subject to all the rules, modified only by the special limitation of debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to say one word before the Chair submits the question to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the Chair ought to be sustained in its ruling. The rule read by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is one of the standing rules of the House, and it provides that when in the Committee of the Whole House a bill is reached and objection is made, the committee shall rise and the House shall then determine whether that bill shall further be considered or not. Therefore by one of the standing rules the House may determine the order in which bills shall be considered upon the Calendar. On Monday last, however, the day on which, under the rules, they could be suspended, those rules were suspended and the House adopted a special order. Just so soon as that special order was adopted by a vote of the House it became pro tanto one of the rules of the House and suspended every rule which interfered with its execution.

And what does that special order or the rule then adopted provide? It provides that these bills shall be considered, not in the order which the House may designate, but in the order which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shall designate. They are not to be considered in the order in which they stand upon the Calendar, but under this rule, made by the special order, they are to be considered in the order in which they are designated by the committee.

Mr. THOMPSON. That applies to the House and not to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the House of course, under the special order, had the right to designate the order in which the bills were to be considered; but when the committee designated the bill which was to be first considered its power was exhausted under the special order, and the House then proceeded to consider the bill under the rules of the House, modified only as to the length of debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. The committee has designated the order in which these bills shall be considered, and one of them is now before the committee under that designation, and we can not go behind that order of the House without suspending the rules, and this is not the place nor is this the day when the rules can be suspended. The chairman is evidently right in his ruling, and I hope he will be sustained. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Mr. Chairman, I submit we should proceed to dispose of the business of the House according to its accepted rules. It is true, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has said, that on last Monday when the rules permitted there was a motion made to suspend the rules and fix a special order for to-day. Now, I ask the House and I ask the gentleman from Illinois what was the operation of the adoption of that special order? It simply set aside for this day an order of business as laid down by Rule XXIV.

Mr. SPRINGER. It suspended all rules inconsistent with that special order and made it the rule of the House for the purpose of considering these bills.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. It was an order adopted for the purpose of setting aside Rule XXIV, which established the order of business and gave priority in the operation of that rule to a class of business provided for in the special order. What then? Beyond that the committee can not do anything else. It has been said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that the special order is the rule to guide the Chair. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that no standing rule of this House can be changed except on one day's notice, nor can it be rescinded without one day's notice. Rule XXVIII says that no standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without a day's notice.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. The special order set aside the rules of the House.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Wait until I get through.

On Monday last the House by a two-thirds vote set aside the order of business, as provided for by the rules. The regular order of business of the morning hour and going to the business upon the Speaker's table, as well as other matters provided for by the rules, were dispensed with by the adoption of the special order. Having set aside the order of business established by Rule XXIV, are you now going to say, when you get into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, all proper motions made under the rules for the purpose of executing the order of the House adopted by a two-thirds vote shall not be recognized? If that be so, then to carry the point to its logical consequences the adoption of the special order left us without any other rule but that special order. I should like to have gentlemen who announce that theory to tell us where otherwise we get the authority to go into committee? If you suspend all the rules of the House you suspend the right to go into committee as well.

But the House did go into committee under the rules of the House, and under the special order the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] designated the bill which was to be considered. The special order was fully carried out, but then the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] rose and under the rules of the House said he objected to the further consideration of the bill. The Chair has decided that his objection was not in order. It certainly is in order under the rules of the House, and nowhere does the special order provide that that rule shall be suspended. What was the object of the rule? It was to have the sense of the House tested as to which one of a series of measures coming up for consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had the strength to be first acted on in committee. If the special order made it imperative upon the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider and pass on every one of these bills in their order, then this House has abdicated its authority to say under the rules which shall come up first and which shall come up next. To do that is to destroy and rescind all the rules of the House, of which the House has had no notice, and of course that can not be done.

I will for the information of the Chair read what Cushing says on this subject in his Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, section 1512:

> In the two Houses of Congress, beside orders of the day which are established in virtue of the parliamentary law and privileged questions which are made so by a general rule, orders of the above description are occasionally made which have the effect, under the name of special orders or assignments, to override or take precedence of all other business whatsoever. Orders of this kind may be made in the manner agreed upon and pointed out in the rules or by the ordinary major vote. In the House of Representatives it is provided by the rule that the order of business as established by the rules shall not be changed except by a vote of at least two-thirds; and in that assembly a special order (which to have the effect above mentioned must necessarily change the established order of business, and operate to suspend the rules relating to business), made for that purpose, requires a majority of two-thirds; if made by a majority only, the order so made would only have precedence over other business of the same class not made special. Of two special orders for the consideration of different topics at the same time the one first made is entitled to precedence over the other. The business which is thus made the subject of a special order is to be proceeded with at the appointed time, and may be finished by doing whatever may be necessary to that end under the order.

That is all it has done. It has changed the order of business as provided by Rule XXIV; and unless you declare that this House by the adoption of that order on last Monday has disorganized itself and abdicated its authority, you can not sustain the ruling of the Chair upon that proposition. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, there can be no doubt but that it is the duty of the House, through its committee, to consider these bills for the erection of public buildings in the same way that it considers all other bills of like character, except in so far as the special order made by the House on last Monday may suspend those proceedings.

A great deal of stress is put upon a rule which allows a single objection to be made in committee to the consideration of a bill, and which rule, when that objection is made, requires the committee to rise and report the objection to the House. It is claimed that the operation of that rule applies here. Let me say, first, that that question of consideration is the very one of all others that is absolutely settled by the special rule of the House adopted on last Monday. It is the question of consideration itself. And, secondly, let me say that the paragraph of Rule XX, which has been referred to, when it is examined carefully will be found to be an impossibility in its application under this special rule. That paragraph refers to an objection made to bills when they are being considered in their order upon the Calendar, and provides that when objection is made the House is given the right to decide that the bill to which objection is made shall be laid aside for the present or the consideration proceeded with, whichever the House may determine.

But the rule under which we are now acting requires that we shall consider all bills reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and all other bills of like character on the Speaker's table in the order designated by the committee, and act on each one of them. That is the effect of the rule. So that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in this instance, and so far as the question of consideration is concerned, is made supreme, and it may name in committee any one of these bills that is to be made a subject of special consideration; and when we are required under the rule to consider them we consider them under the general parliamentary rules governing the House. There is no difficulty about that.

But the question of consideration is determined by the very language of the special rule, and therefore the decision of the Chair is eminently correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I now yield so much time as he may desire to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID].

Mr. McCOID. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the committee but a few moments, and in that time I wish to call their attention away from the discussion that has just taken place to the merits of the pending bill.

This is a bill providing for the erection of a public building at Keokuk, Iowa. They have in that city the circuit court of the United States, the district court of the United States——

Mr. BEACH. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEACH. I desire to know whether we can not demand the reading of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been already read.

Mr. BEACH. Then let us have the report read.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I make the point of order that you can not take the gentleman from Iowa off the floor in that way.

Mr. BEACH. I wish to hear the report of the committee, if in order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no rule requiring that to be read. The gentleman from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. McCOID. They have there the Des Moines Rapids Canal, upon the Mississippi River, and the officers and men in charge, and all of the works in connection with the canal, as well as the other officers connected with the commerce upon the river. The city is one of 15,000 inhabitants. It is between that and 20,000 now. It is a city of free delivery. The Government receives from the post-office alone at that place over $27,000 a year of revenue. The Government has, in connection with its other interests at that city, a national cemetery, where soldiers from both sides sleep beneath the flag, and the officers in charge of it. Keokuk is a city on the Mississippi River at the point where the Des Moines River, running southeastwardly through the State of Iowa, empties into the Mississippi. Across the river on the other side are three towns, Warsaw, Hamilton, and Alexandria, having a population of 3,000, 1,500, and about 1,200, so that we have a total population in and adjoining Keokuk of considerably over 20,000 inhabitants.

It is a beautiful city, well located, and has been the key of the commerce by water of that State from an early date, being at the head of the deep water navigation of the Mississippi River. It is true that since the war the city has not grown as rapidly as some others. It is far enough south of the line of the Union Pacific Railroad and continental trunk lines to have been affected somewhat by the commercial conditions that grew up during the war and since, and which have affected all of the cities south of that line. But it has superior natural advantages and is now taking a new growth. A great many manufacturing establishments have started into life within the last two or three years. Important works are being built up; and it is going to be, if it is not now, one of the most important cities in the State.

The bill is meritorious, as much so as any bill before this House. There need to be upon the merits no question whatever in the mind of any gentleman.

Until I hear something against it, I reserve the remainder of the time the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] has given me.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question: How much rent is paid by the Government for public buildings in Keokuk?

Mr. McCOID. For the court-house alone a rent is paid of $1,000 a year. I have a letter from the Attorney-General stating that fact in connection with the necessity for a public building for the court.

Mr. THOMPSON. One thousand dollars for the court-house?

Mr. McCOID. This is what the letter of the Attorney-General says:

> In reply to your letter of this date asking an opinion as to the necessity of a public building at Keokuk, Iowa, for the accommodation of the United States courts, I have to say that this Department is now paying rent to the amount of $1,000 per annum for accommodation of United States courts and officers.

I wish to say further in answer to the gentleman's question that at the last term of the court Judge Love, the district judge, had to go into the State court building to hold his court, Judge McCrary holding the circuit court in the rented room that they occupy.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the gentleman from Iowa state how much, if anything, is paid for other public buildings at Keokuk. The post-office, for example.

Mr. McCOID. I do not know how much is paid for the post-office.

Mr. THOMPSON. How much would this public building cost?

Mr. McCOID. The bill provides an appropriation of only $150,000.

Mr. THOMPSON. Is that the whole expense?

Mr. McCOID. That is the full expense. The bill says it shall be the limit of the expenditure. That amount, I wish to say, is fixed upon an estimate made by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and, as I understand, with the approval of the Department. The estimate was sent to the committee and the amount was fixed from that.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then we are to put up a building for $150,000 to save $1,000 rent.

Mr. McCOID. That is not the case. That is the rent merely for the court-house.

Mr. THOMPSON. I did not understand the gentleman to say there was rent for anything else.

Mr. McCOID. Oh, yes. Besides the post-office, the officers in charge of the canal, the revenue officers, and other officers of the United States are at that point.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman for information as to how much the local court-house cost?

Mr. McCOID. I can not tell you that. That county of Lee is the oldest, and perhaps wealthiest, and has two county seats—at Keokuk and Fort Madison. The State of Iowa has the largest and chief penitentiary in the State in the same county. I do not know what was the cost of the public building for the State court.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. YOUNG. I object to the gentleman from Iowa yielding all his time to the other side to ask questions. Let them use their own time.

Mr. McCOID. I decline to yield further, and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume the bill is now open to amendment. I move, in line 11, to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$100,000."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Make it $75,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend suggests $75,000, and I will modify my amendment accordingly. To put the House in possession of the facts in addition to those stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID], I desire that this article from a leading newspaper in that portion of the State of Iowa be read. The article is from the Burlington Daily Gazette; and I call special attention to this article for this reason.

Mr. McCOID. I wish to know if that comes out of the time on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. It comes out of the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course it does. I hope the committee will give attention to the reading of this article. It is not a newspaper published in the town of Keokuk, a very prosperous little city of 15,000 people, I believe, in the southeastern corner of Iowa; it is not a newspaper published in that city, but it is published in that section of the State; and I am assured, and I presume that assurance will be confirmed by the gentleman who has addressed the committee, that it is a highly respectable newspaper, and it professes to report the facts.

Mr. WILKINS. Is it an article from a newspaper published in a rival city?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is from a newspaper published in another city of Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

A WORD TO CONGRESS ON THE PROPOSED KEOKUK PUBLIC BUILDING.

Upon what sound principle of finance or political economy can the appropriation asked by Congressman McCOID for a public building at Keokuk be justified?

At the last census Keokuk had a smaller population than the census reports showed ten years before, yet during all these years, while the Government was spending money lavishly in building the canal for Keokuk's benefit, Hon. George W. McCrary never thought of asking an appropriation for a public building, or if he thought of it he refused to do it, because he knew there was no justification for such an appropriation. What reason has come into existence since? None in the world, but the intense anxiety of the people of that good little city to anchor there the Federal court, which they plainly see will, in the language of Mr. McCOID, soon "come to Burlington by the force of gravitation" unless they do something to hold it against this force. It is thought that a building will accomplish this purpose. Such an object is an unworthy one, and should be resisted on principle as a waste of the people's money.

That there is no earthly use for the building is abundantly proven by the testimony of many prominent citizens of Keokuk. In 1878 a bill was pending to bring this court back to Burlington, where it rightfully belongs, and these good citizens appeared and opposed it, their best argument being the following, which is quoted from their printed brief (page 7):

"One of the largest and best buildings in the State has been leased by the Government for the use of the court so lately as February of this year (1878). A court-room, with convenient and commodious offices for judge, attorneys, marshal, clerk, &c., has just been fitted up at much expense. The rent paid by the Government for the whole is but $700 per annum."

The following is an extract from Marshal Root's letter, found on page 8 of the brief:

"The court is now located in the Estes Building, the largest building in the city. The court-room is large and commodious, well adapted to the purpose, suitably furnished, and other rooms for other officers on same floor and perfectly convenient to the court-room. These rooms have recently been refitted and refurnished for accommodation of this court. The court has recently removed at the expense of the Government from another building."

Again, on page 10, is found this:

"There is another reason why no change should be made. The Government has just moved into new and commodious quarters for holding the court and has made a lease for a term of years on the building, which in case of removal would be a dead loss."

And on the same page is the following:

"The court has been recently removed into new quarters leased to the Government at low figures, and fitted up by the lessors for the purposes of court, business in a manner most convenient and practicable. The quarters are well adapted and could not be improved upon. Every officer of the court is well satisfied with the present situation."

How is it possible for any member of Congress who reads this testimony, out of the mouths of the very men who are now urging this appropriation, and who wants to be faithful to his public trust, vote to expend one or two hundred thousand dollars of the public money for a building for this same court? Let a reform Congress beware of such dereliction in squandering the money wrung from the people by taxation.

The situation in Keokuk is now precisely the same as when this florid argument was made by its representative men. What does the argument show?

1. The Government occupies the largest building in Keokuk, and one of the largest in the State.

2. That it has a lease of it for a term of years, and has fitted it up with a view to convenience.

3. It is admirably adapted with offices on same floor for judge and all other officers, and it is so good that it can not be improved upon.

4. The cost to the Government is only $700 a year.

5. A removal of the court will result in a dead loss of this rental to the Government. That is to say, if the Government should remove the court and surrender the lease no one would rent the largest building in the city, as there is no other use for it except for a court-house.

And yet the men who deplore the loss of $700 a year for a few years on a lease are urging the Government to give up this well-adapted, commodious, cheap, and "not to be improved" establishment and spend $200,000 in erecting a building of its own—to incur an expenditure of six or seven thousand dollars a year for that which it is now getting for $700. This is not the kind of economy and reform the present Democratic Congress was elected to enforce, nor is it the kind that will tend to recommend it to further continuance in power. Such conduct will be no improvement on the "river and harbor bill" of the last Congress, partly on account of which the Democrats gained so many seats.

It won't do to say it is a small matter. He who is not faithful over a few things is utterly unworthy to be trusted with many things. We again warn our Democratic friends to beware of this kind of legislation, and when you are invited to "swap jack-knives," as it is called, on these local appropriations, remember the knives are not yours to "swap."

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know exactly what the editor means by "swapping jack-knives" and remembering that the knives are not ours. I do not know exactly what the application of that may be. But there is one fact in that communication to which I wish to call the attention of this side of the House especially. That paper has adopted the general theory accepted through this entire country, that this is a "reform Congress." Whether we act upon that principle or not, that is the conviction that has settled down upon the country. And one of the most potent arguments against this system of public edifices and palatial buildings, and the one which through the country has rendered the practice of appropriating annually for these buildings the most objectionable, is derived from the large sums you appropriate for each of these cities. Here is a city of 15,000 people, a prosperous little city in a State in which I believe there are seven or eight points where Federal courts are held. If I am wrong the gentleman can correct me.

Mr. McCOID. The number is six.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are, it seems, six points in the State where Federal courts are held. Here is a city with a population of 15,000, and this bill coolly proposes to appropriate $150,000 to erect a public building convenient for the population in that comparatively small portion of the State of Iowa for the accommodation of the Federal court at that point. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have moved to reduce that amount at the instance of gentlemen around me to what it seems to me would be regarded anywhere else than here a sufficient sum, $75,000. It can not be said that is not ample.

I say to gentlemen that they will largely remove the objections of our people to the erection of these buildings if they will make the appropriations therefor moderate and reasonable. The sum of $75,000 will pay for a building which will greatly exceed any of the public buildings generally erected in the States of Ohio and Indiana for the convenience of a much larger body of public officers and for the administration of justice.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do so for the purpose of correcting a great error into which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID] seems to have fallen, and into which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to a certain extent has followed him. The gentleman from Indiana, I believe, I am so informed, has stated that the population of Keokuk is in the neighborhood of 20,000. Am I correct?

Mr. McCOID. I stated that the population of Keokuk, with that of the adjoining town on the opposite side of the river, was at least 20,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. If that is so, then I undertake to say that there has been a most wonderful increase of population in that town for the last three years. I have before me the returns of the census of 1880, from which I learn that the population of the city of Keokuk by wards is put down at 12,117. What was the population of that town ten years before?

According to the returns of the then census, only ten years before, that same town had a population of 12,776, six hundred inhabitants more than it had according to the census of 1880, or about 5 per cent. more.

Now, where is the thrift of this town which should call for an appropriation of $150,000 to erect a public building there? Where is the necessity for it? I am in favor of making appropriation for the erection of a public building wherever that is necessary. But I do protest most earnestly against building magnificent structures in towns where the commerce of the town does not keep down the pennyroyal or the dog-fennel in its streets.

Mr. HOLMAN. One additional word. I feel very confident that if we should make moderate appropriations here for these public buildings we will remove one of the strongest objections on the part of the people to this system. If you appropriate $150,000 for this particular building you will erect a building out of all proportion to the balance of the improvements in that city. The sum of $75,000 is certainly ample for any building which may be needed there. Indeed, I think that that amount would provide about as convenient and ample a building as would be provided with twice that amount.

Gentlemen must remember that the mere cost of the building is not all the expenditure that is involved. There is the construction of the approaches to the building, the improvement of the grounds about it, the furnishing of the building, and after the building is erected there is the necessity of large expenditures to maintain it, the expense of insurance and other items of expenditure. Therefore, if you pay out $75,000 for a building to take the place of the one now occupied by the United States court and which is described in the newspaper article which I have read, you will increase beyond all measure the expense of your public offices at Keokuk, even if you put the cost of the building at $75,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate in opposition to the bill has been exhausted. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID] has three minutes of his time remaining, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID] the remainder of my time.

Mr. McCOID. I want to say first that I now have the figures indicating the rents paid by the United States for offices in the city of Keokuk. For the post-office there is paid a rent of $1,200 a year; for the court room $1,000; for chambers in connection with the court $300, and for other offices $500; making a total of $3,000 a year.

In regard to the newspaper article which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has had read, I think every gentleman on the floor understands what that amounts to. I think they know that it is simply a neighborhood quarrel growing out of the rivalry between two towns in my district.

Mr. HOLMAN. What about the matters of fact stated in that article?

Mr. McCOID. I will come to that. In regard to the statement of facts, the most charitable thing that could be said is that it is probably another of Burdette's jokes; nothing else. The facts in this case are what I have already stated and what have been found by the committee. The committee find from the evidence before them that this city contains a population of 15,000 inhabitants. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] cites the census of the population of this town. There must be some mistake about that. It may be another instance like that of Saint Louis, where the census-takers did not get the proper figures in ascertaining the population.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would inquire of the gentleman how many officials are to be accommodated in this building?

Mr. McCOID. I can not stop for questions now; I have but a few minutes. In regard to the amount named in the bill I think gentlemen on this floor will say that $150,000 is not too much, considering the interests of the United States involved and the rent which is now paid by the Government there. The rent now paid by the Government for accommodations in the city of Keokuk equals the interest on $80,000 of United States bonds at 4 per cent. The necessities of the court are beyond question. I hope no gentleman on this floor will be misled into antagonizing this bill because of anything that has been read here or stated concerning the rivalry of two towns in relation to a matter which has been decided by this Congress four or five times. That matter has been here at times for ten years, and has been again and again decided by Congress in favor of Keokuk.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCOID. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. The gentleman says that by the erection of this building the Government would save about $3,000 annually which it now pays for rent.

Mr. McCOID. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. And then the gentleman in some way, by some sort of figures, what I can not understand, says that that amount of rent so saved would equal the interest on $180,000 of bonds. I would like to inquire what sort of bonds?

Mr. McCOID. I meant $80,000; if the gentleman pleases I have erred on the right side; I have made it too little.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate upon this bill has expired. The question is now upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment and to be heard upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has been exhausted.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understood that there were three minutes left to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER].

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes in favor of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understand that the special order does not say there shall be fifteen minutes for and fifteen minutes against the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that that is exactly what the special order does state.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I certainly did not want to speak in favor of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair supposed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] so as to make the appropriation $50,000 instead of $75,000.

I would like to debate this proposition if I had the opportunity.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that the object of this amendment is to delay or obstruct legislation. I want to inquire whether if gentlemen claim the right to debate these amendments they will be permitted to do so under the resolution of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, to the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, there were—ayes 40, noes 89.

[Cries of "No quorum!"]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better have a quorum on this vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair orders tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 31, noes 135.

So the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, was not agreed to.

The question being then taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, to make the appropriation $75,000 instead of $150,000, there were—ayes 61, nbes 100.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. McCOID and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 107.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out "fifty;" so as to make the appropriation $100,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment so as to make the appropriation $80,000.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, there were—ayes 34, noes 95.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. McCOID and Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 26, noes 142.

So the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, there were—ayes 72, noes 83.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there is no quorum. I call for tellers in any event.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. McCOID were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 92.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend by striking out "fifty" and inserting "twenty-five;" so as to make the appropriation $125,000.

Several MEMBERS. Let the amendment be read.

The Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 107, noes 26.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it may be agreed that a motion may be made in the House to reduce this appropriation to $100,000; and in that event—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the other side will agree to that, we will withdraw the call for a quorum.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should think that in the interest of public business—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the taking of the vote by tellers. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 133, noes 31.

So the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WACO, TEX.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I now call up the bill (H. R. 1570) for the erection of a public building at Waco, Tex.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as the bill is reported the Chair will submit the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON].

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States court, post-offices, internal-revenue office, and other Government offices, at the city of Waco, in the State of Texas. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $100,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Texas shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was read, as follows:

Insert after the words "one hundred thousand dollars" the words "which is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will yield now twelve minutes of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] has moved that the committee rise.

The committee refused to rise.

Mr. MILLS. I hope, Mr. Chairman, I shall have the attention of the committee. In the first place, I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the committee, and I do not know in its present temper I should do it, but I will do it, and that is that the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill. It is precisely word for word the same as the House bill with the amendment reported to the House bill from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The only reason for it is that if the Senate bill be taken up and passed it will save all further loss of time, whereas if we pass this House bill it will have to go back to the Senate and the whole thing be gone over again. I hope there will be no objection to considering the Senate bill instead of the House bill and voting on it instead of the House bill. I believe it is a reasonable request.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I object. It may be that the reconsideration in the Senate may be a good thing. I do not know how that is; I have not yet heard any explanation of this bill. I do not know what is the population of Waco.

Mr. MILLS. I will give you the population of Waco.

Mr. ANDERSON What is it?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to reserve the right to object until I hear the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would be hardly competent for the committee to do as requested by the gentleman from Texas even by unanimous consent, because the House has directed the committee what to do. The Chair is willing to hear from the gentleman from Texas on that point.

Mr. MILLS. I have nothing further to say. I accept the decision of the Chair. I only wish to say, in a few minutes, this: The population of Waco by the census of 1880 was over 7,200, but by a recent census taken in 1883, under the provisions of a State law in reference to certain benefits to be conferred upon schools, the population was 11,321. Here is a gain of 55 per cent. in three years.

There are two large trunk lines of railway which cross it. It is a seat of learning in our State and has been for a long time. The judges of the circuit and district courts have both united in a letter stating there is no building in Waco suitable to hold court in and that none can be rented.

But without detaining the committee with further discussion, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The special order provides for thirty minutes of debate, and no one can cut that off.

Mr. MILLS. Of course not. I withdraw the motion for the present that the bill be laid aside.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas reserve the remainder of his time?

Mr. MILLS. I do.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to know whether I can not have five minutes' time in my own right, because I want to expose to this country the hypocrisy which characterizes the proceedings of this Committee of the Whole House. I have never engaged in filibustering. I have always been in favor of the exercise of the power intrusted to the constitutional majority of this House, and against such political Anaks as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and perpetual objectors, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HORR. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HORR. There is so much confusion I can not hear a word of what the gentleman from Colorado is saying. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] in opposition to the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to learn from the gentleman from Texas what kind of a building it is proposed to erect at Waco under this bill, and what uses it is to be devoted to.

Mr. MILLS. It is necessary for holding the Federal courts and providing internal-revenue offices.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What is the population of Waco?

Mr. MILLS. It is as I stated it. The report accompanying the bill states all the facts.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But that report has not been read.

Mr. MILLS. It has been printed and laid upon every member's desk.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. A great many reports have been printed and laid upon our desks or sent to our rooms—more than I could read in three months if I did nothing else. As I understand the gentleman, the population of this town of Waco was 7,200 in 1880 and that it has rapidly increased since then. Do they need such a public building there? I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas what he thinks is the probable cost of the best building now in that place? Is it more than ten or fifteen thousand dollars?

Mr. MILLS. I want to state in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, that there are court-houses over the whole State of Texas that are worth perhaps from $25,000 to $100,000 each. The one in my own county cost about $50,000. They have spent vast sums to erect public buildings for the State in all parts of Texas.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Now, will the gentleman be kind enough to state as to the dwellings of the people of Texas, will he give us the average value of their class of buildings, the homes of the people who pay the taxes to build these other costly structures?

Mr. MILLS. I have never entered into an estimate of the cost of them.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will venture to assert, Mr. Chairman, that their average value is not $500 to a family. While at the rate of $100,000, which it is proposed to appropriate for the construction of this public building and other public buildings in little towns of eight or ten thousand inhabitants, it will be found on investigation to be at the rate of not less than $10,000 for office-room for every Government official that will be provided for in these buildings.

I might be willing to vote for a reasonable sum for buildings in some of the more important of these places—a sum that would be sufficient to put up a building that would compare favorably with other buildings in the same town—but I am opposed to all these monumental structures the Government is erecting all over the country.

By the last census I find that the total value of all the buildings in the United States, including business houses in all the cities and the real estate connected with them, amounts to less than $200 per capita. The average, I say, is less than $200 for each inhabitant of the United States, admitting all of the buildings of your great cities into the calculation, and, as is well known, some of them are very costly. And when you come down to the homes of the people, they who pay for all these grand structures you are building, the cost of their homes averages less than $500 per family. The houses in which the great majority of the people of the country live and rear and educate their families will not average more than $300 or $400 per family, and yet you propose to tax them to construct public buildings to cost from $10,000 to $15,000 for the office-room for the few public officials who will be accommodated in them. That, sir, is what I object to.

Some one has written:

> Of Augustus and Rome
> The poet may warble—
> How he found it of brick
> And left it of marble.

But the truth of history is that when Rome was brick her people had homes, but when Rome was marble her people were in the streets—"without houses, without homes, with nothing left but the air they breathe, they wander from place to place with their wives and their children," is what its historian says. And the story of Rome is the story of every country that has robbed its people to increase the magnificence of an official class. That is what we are doing in this country, when we are taxing our people to build such structures as are provided for in the bills of this character brought before this House.

But, sir, I object to another thing. I object to the way these bills come here under this special order, because I find them all fastened together as links in one sausage, and evidently not all good meat, but it appears that under this special order they are all to go together. "You help mine and I will help yours." Some of these bills no doubt are good ones, but generally they are too costly. Some I could vote for, but some are altogether bad, and I object to this mode of forcing down our throats any of these bills under this order with but thirty minutes' debate. As long as I believe that there is a combination to put these bills through, good and bad alike, I will fight against all of them.

But if this combination is broken and we can construct public buildings only in places where they are really needed, and where United States courts are held, and of the character which the people of these places can afford to construct for themselves—the best class of such buildings—I should be willing to vote, no doubt, for many of them. But this erection of monuments to fancy architects in all of the little towns and villages of the country is the worst sort of extravagance. And let me remind this House that just such a class of bills as this, coupled with an extravagant river and harbor bill, by the last Republican Congress is what defeated that party in the election two years ago. The people at the polls condemned such extravagance.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The river and harbor bill was the best measure that passed the last Congress.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The people said they did not want any more like it. Thirty or forty public buildings were authorized by the last Congress, I believe.

But, Mr. Chairman, this Congress was elected as a reform Congress and on the issue of economy, and I for one am willing to stand up always for wise economy. Economy has never impoverished a family; economy never beggared anybody. It has never bankrupted a State, but the want of it has been the cause of the downfall of many a proud kingdom. Voltaire said of Prussia that two hundred years ago it was but the desert of Brandenburg, but by the economy of her great Fredericks it became the center of a great power, and has become at last the most powerful state in Europe. At that same time, under Louis XIV and Louis XV, France, a rich kingdom, by the opposite policy became a beggared state. Louis XIV built theaters and churches and costly public buildings. But while the king was thus adding to his magnificence and building monuments the people were starving and the peasantry being made slaves.

That country is the best off which has the greatest number of comfortable homes for its people, and not that which has the greatest number of grand structures erected at great public cost. Somebody must pay, Mr. Chairman, for these buildings, and they pay in the end who earn on the average not $400 per year, and whose families are brought up in homes that do not average $500 per family.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does the gentleman say to this House that the people of Russia, the common people of Russia, are in a better condition than the people of France?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have said nothing about the people of Russia.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Than the people of Prussia?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I say it is the wise public economy of Prussia and of Germany that has elevated that state to the proud eminence it now holds, and it was the opposite policy that prostrated France in the dust a century ago.

I said it was the opposite policy that has left the ruined marble structures of Rome to stand as monuments of the folly of the age that built them. One policy enriches the people, the other magnifies but, at the same time, enfeebles a government and does not improve its officials.

Mr. BURLEIGH. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Is it not true that in France the common people raised more money to pay off their national debt than was ever done in any other nation?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. France has not paid off her debt. France to-day owes $3,800,000,000, on which her laboring classes must pay over $150,000,000 of interest annually. That is the result of the wasteful policy inaugurated years ago in France, the opposite of the economical policy of Germany. But it is true that the people of France since the revolution have greatly changed. Instead of spending their energies in magnifying rulers they have gone to work for themselves, and have been building railroads and canals and improving land and making better homes; just what every free people ought to do. The France I refer to was the France of Louis XIV, when she was pursuing the policy we are pursuing now, and wasting the people's labor and the people's money on monumental buildings instead of letting the people keep it for the improvement of their own homes. I am prepared to stand always for public economy as well as for private economy. Why, sir, the wealth of the world is nothing else but what has been saved by wise economy. And, sir, I do protest against proceeding under such an order as is now being executed, under which a lot of bills—forty or fifty or more, and more to come—for public buildings are to be put through the House. This combining together the interests of members of this House and in that way putting bills through is the worst sort of legislation. It is, I say, an iniquitous order, and I give notice that until that order is vacated I am ready to resort to every means known to the rules of the House to defeat the purpose for which the order was taken.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask the gentleman from Ohio when he changed his opinion on the subject of unlimited greenbacks with which he was willing to flood this country?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will answer the gentleman from Colorado by asking him to tell when or where, in what speech or utterance or publication, I ever favored or advocated any such thing or favored any such policy. I have never advocated greenbacks or any other form of currency, except to maintain a currency already in existence, or to keep the volume of money stable as the only way to preserve stability of value. The gentleman is therefore mistaken when he attributes any such doctrine to me, as he will find if he will read what I have said or written on that question.

Mr. BELFORD. The gentlemen from Ohio was elected to this House on that distinct issue, and now he appears as a convert to another theory.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER].

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not know that I can make myself heard in the present confusion and temper of the House. But I desire as a Democrat, as one who has been in Congress now for the last ten years, to enter my protest against this species of legislation. We are tramping, my friends, just where the Republican majority tramped two years ago.

A MEMBER. That is what you are always doing.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am told that we are always doing that. It looks very much like it, my friend, I confess. [Laughter.] But we are two years behind that side of the House in the extravagance of making appropriations, not for general purposes but for personal and local purposes. We are putting on the old cast-off habiliments of our friends on the other side that they put on in the first session of the last Congress, in consequence of which the people repudiated them and elected a majority to this House in the interest of economy and reform. And does this look like reform, like reduction of taxation, with appropriations proposed for public buildings amounting, my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] says, to from ten to twenty million dollars?

Mr. WILLIS. I beg my friend's pardon. I do not know what the amount is. I should say five or six million dollars.

A MEMBER. Seven millions.

Mr. WILLIS. Very well, seven millions; which is about three millions less than we have expended at half a dozen points in the United States.

Mr. BUCKNER. It is a larger amount than the Republicans were condemned for spending, and they admitted when they returned here after that election that that was one of the grounds on which the people had elected this House with a majority on this side.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him——

Mr. BUCKNER. Not now. I know this, that when the short session was held you did not attempt to pass any of the bills that were then on the table except one, and that was in my own State, where the Government made by the operation a clear saving.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does the gentleman from Missouri advise this House to vote upon the merits of this bill, or to vote with a view to a Democratic or Republican victory?

Mr. BUCKNER. I want to vote on it in the interest of the people, and not in the interest of members of Congress.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is dodging the question. Are we to vote upon the merits of the measure before us?

Mr. BUCKNER. There are no merits in it. You are proposing to spend here $100,000 on a pretext that it is for the public benefit, when $50,000 will build you a house that will be substantial and sufficient for all purposes.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Did not Alabama get a large amount for public buildings?

Mr. BUCKNER. I am not from Alabama. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDEMAN. I meant to say Missouri.

Mr. BUCKNER. I have not any share in this transaction.

A MEMBER. That is what is the matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCKNER. I hope, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen will allow me to get along with my argument. I do not often claim the indulgence of the House.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Did not Missouri get $6,000,000 for one building, the building at Saint Louis?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. There is so much confusion that we can not hear the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. HARDEMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has not yet answered my question. Will he tell us what Saint Louis and Hannibal in his State have got?

Mr. BUCKNER. The Saint Louis building cost $4,000,000.

Mr. HARDEMAN. No wonder you are surfeited. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCKNER. The difference from these bills is that the Government needed buildings in Saint Louis and Jefferson City. It needed them there.

Here are bills to provide buildings at places where you have to bring in the office of collector of internal revenue, when we all know that the internal-revenue officer may be changed from one place to another. And you have no other officer in the place to provide accommodations for.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the fifteen minutes in opposition to the bill has been exhausted.

Mr. MILLS. I would inquire how much time I have left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eleven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MILLS. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the Democratic lecture which we have heard from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER]. I want to ask that gentleman, before he walks too far away from his seat——

Mr. BUCKNER. I will listen to you with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. MILLS. I want to ask that gentleman to tell us if he got up and gave this House the benefit of the economic strictures which he has just delivered when the bill was pending for the erection of a building at Hannibal, Mo.?

Mr. BUCKNER. I was here.

Mr. MILLS. I saw you here.

Mr. BUCKNER. I did not vote for it.

Mr. MILLS. No, but you were as silent as the grave.

Mr. BUCKNER. I did not vote for it.

Mr. MILLS. Why did not you speak against it then, as you have spoken now?

Mr. BUCKNER. I did not do it because I did not do my duty; and you are not doing your duty now.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, I am; and I did my duty by Hannibal. I want to know what the gentleman said about Saint Louis and Kansas City when bills were pending here for the erection of public buildings in those cities. Did you enlighten the House with your views on that subject when those bills were pending? What makes you so sudden a convert to the cause of economy now?

Mr. BUCKNER. I will tell you. It is because you have made a ring here in which you expect to get your "share of the pork."

Mr. MILLS. And you have already got your "share of the pork." [Great laughter]. The gentleman from Missouri is a funny man; he is a singular statesman. He says that we have been elected by our people to come here and reduce taxation. Now, I want to ask that gentleman if he has not been "shooing" down our efforts to reduce taxation on the food and clothing used by the people of the United States and on their farming implements?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir.

Mr. MILLS. You have been contending that it was impolitic and unwise for us to do anything on that question.

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, I have.

Mr. MILLS. That is what I said. All the trouble with the gentleman is that he has not a public building in his little town in Missouri, the name of which I do not know.

I will now yield four minutes of my time to my friend from Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and will yield to my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has nine minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. GOFF. In the few moments of time allowed me on this matter I desire to call the attention of the committee particularly to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], and to what I conceive to be his erroneous conception of the question involved in this bill and in other bills of a similar character.

The gentleman tells us that this bill should not pass for the reason that the city in Texas where this building is to be erected is of small dimensions, that its population is only a few thousand. I, for one, claim that the people residing in a city of a few thousand inhabitants are as much entitled to the privileges and benefits of a building of this character as are those who reside in the great cities of Louisville, Saint Louis, Boston, New York, Cincinnati, and other large cities.

These buildings are not for the benefit of the inhabitants of these cities only; they are constructed for the benefit of all the people of the United States residing in the respective States of this Union. Over 200,000 of the people of the State of Texas transact business under their judicial system in this city of Waco, and they are entitled when they go there to find a building which will furnish the necessary accommodations for the proper transaction of their business. It is altogether a mistake to say that the people of the town alone are interested in the building to be erected there. While the population of this place is perhaps not 10,000, there are more than 200,000 of the people of Texas who are compelled to go there by the processes of courts, and to bring their suits at that point. You then have really a population of 200,000 who are interested in the construction of this building.

I am not scared at this clamor for reform; I am not frightened by this cry of economy. I believe the people of this country are in favor of the construction of public buildings at all points where they are demanded by the public interest. For one, I am in favor of the Government flag floating over a building owned by the Government at every point where the Government has established a court.

The CHAIRMAN. The four minutes of the gentleman have expired.

Mr. MILLS. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not think it necessary to occupy any of the time of the committee by remarks on this bill.

Mr. MILLS. Then let us have a vote.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend the bill by striking out "$100,000" and inserting "$50,000;" so that it will read:

Shall not exceed for the site and building complete $50,000.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I now move to amend by reducing the appropriation from $100,000 to $75,000.

The amendment was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 42, noes 120.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon laying the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 135, noes 21.

So (no further count being called for) the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GREENVILLE, S. C.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Under instructions from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I now call up the bill (H. R. 1458) for the erection of a public building at Greenville, S. C.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I hope not.

The motion of Mr. THOMPSON was agreed to; there being—ayes 91, noes 75.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration bills for the erection of public buildings, had directed him to report back to the House the bill (H. R. 483) for the erection of a public building at Keokuk, Iowa, and the bill (H. R. 1570) for the erection of a public building at Waco, Tex., and to recommend that the first-named bill be passed without amendment, and the last with an amendment.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move that the House now take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Several MEMBERS. Say 11.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the motion to adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 75, noes 92.

Mr. THOMPSON. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 17—not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. THOMPSON. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered; and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had concurred in the resolution of the House that the enrolling clerk of the House, in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under the authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor," be directed to substitute the word "therefor" for the word "thereof" where it last appears in the Senate amendment to the title.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, has there not been intervening business so that the motion to adjourn may now be renewed?

The SPEAKER. There has been nothing but a message from the Senate. The House has taken no action whatever.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] for a recess by striking out "ten" and inserting "eleven."

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will accept that amendment, and modify my motion accordingly.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. STOCKSLAGER as modified, there were—ayes 127, noes 25.

Mr. THOMPSON. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. THOMPSON and Mr. MILLS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 138, noes 12.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not insist upon the point that no quorum has voted.

So the motion of Mr. STOCKSLAGER for a recess was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 10, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. To-morrow is Good Friday, and I suppose Senators do not desire a meeting of the Senate to-morrow. I therefore move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would not that be amendable by moving to adjourn to Monday?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No.

Mr. SEWELL. Let us adjourn to Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Wisconsin to move to adjourn to Saturday.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move to adjourn to Saturday, but if it is the desire to adjourn over until Monday, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next. The Chair thinks the motion is not amendable.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to modify it so as to adjourn to Monday.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will modify the motion so as to provide for an adjournment to Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HALE. I hope that will not be done. We can not afford certainly now in the state of business to lose the next two days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays upon the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will withdraw the motion until the Senate is full and let the matter be settled once for all. It can be brought up at any time during the day.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator from Maine consent, so far as he is concerned, that the Senate shall adjourn over until Saturday?

Mr. HALE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter is not open to debate, the Chair is obliged to remind Senators. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The Chair will state the question. It is moved by the Senator from Wisconsin that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—30.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 20th ultimo, copies of such accounts and vouchers of the disbursing agent of the Department of Justice for miscellaneous expenses relating to the star-route cases, during the past three years, as appear on file in the Treasury Department; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter of M. A. Healy, commander of the revenue-steamer Corwin, upon the subject of making provision for a new and larger revenue-steamer for duty in Alaskan waters, and recommending an immediate appropriation of $175,000 therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter, with the accompanying report, will be printed. The Chair does not know whether it should go to the Committee on Commerce or the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONGER. If the object of the communication is to ask for an appropriation, it should go to the Committee on Appropriations; but if it is to have a report of a committee upon the necessity for the passage of a law authorizing the construction of such a vessel, it should go to the Committee on Commerce, which has charge of the revenue-marine service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter of the Secretary contains both propositions; the necessity for such a bill, and if coming to the conclusion that it is necessary, recommending that the appropriation be made.

Mr. CONGER. I think if the character of the communication is such that it urges an immediate appropriation it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. Such appropriations have commonly been made, always I think, on appropriation bills. I agree with the Senator from Michigan that if the need is such as is stated, as I presume it is, by the Secretary of the Treasury, as there ought not to be any delay, the matter ought to be considered by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONGER. It was with that view I made the inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication, with the accompanying report, will be referred, if there be no objection, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONGER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement showing the number of enlistments in the Navy during the late war within the boundaries of each State and the States to which the men were accredited; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of G. W. Shuster Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Toronto, Ohio, in favor of the passage of a pension bill recommended by the pension committee of that post; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers and sailors now residing in the State of Kansas, praying that certain changes be made in the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Portland, Me., urging legislation to promote the efficiency of the revenue-marine service, and especially to provide for the retirement of its officers; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM presented resolutions adopted by Manus Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Baldwin, Ill.; resolutions adopted by Olney Post, No. 92, Department of Illinois, Grand Army of the Republic; resolutions adopted by William J. Stephenson Post, No. 249, Department of Illinois, Grand Army of the Republic, favoring the pension legislation recommended by the Grand Army of the Republic committee on pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition adopted by the Grand Army of the Republic of the Department of Utah, embracing the Territories of Utah, Idaho, and Montana, at its second annual encampment, praying Congress to take away all legislative power from the people of Utah until such time as they shall prove themselves worthy of the trust; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SEWELL presented resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Trenton, N. J., praying for the suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOWEN presented the memorial of M. J. McCarty and others, of Costilla County, Colorado, remonstrating against the action of certain claimants to Mexican land grants; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of John Pray and citizens of Lynn and other towns in Massachusetts, machinists, merchants, &c., remonstrating against the passage of the bills now pending for the amendment of the patent laws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PLATT. I present two memorials, one the memorial J. M. Emerson, of Ansonia, Conn., and the other the memorial of the Middletown Publishing Company, of Connecticut, remonstrating against the passage of what is known as the news-copyright bill. I am not aware that any memorial of this kind has been heretofore presented, and I do not know that any bill is now pending in the Senate on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter is under consideration by the Committee on the Library, the Chair believes.

Mr. PLATT. Then I move the reference of these memorials to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAPHAM presented the memorial of F. W. Corson, of Wappinger's Falls, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in favor of the amended Lowell bill for establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy and urging its immediate passage; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of Robert Lawson, Elizabeth Miller, John N. Eslinger, and 40 other men and 49 other women, citizens of the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the States from disfranchizing citizens on account of sex. I believe the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage have reported a resolution on that subject. I move therefore that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Assembly concurrent resolution No. 1, relative to the postal-telegraph bill introduced in Congress by Hon. CHARLES A. SUMNER.

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That we heartily indorse the postal-telegraph bill introduced in Congress by Hon. CHARLES A. SUMNER, of this State, believing it to be an eminently wise and practical measure, and one imperatively demanded by the interests of the people of the United States.

Resolved, That our Senators be, and they are hereby, instructed, and our Representatives requested, to support and by all honorable means endeavor to secure the passage of said bill.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

H. M. LA RUE,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN DAGGETT,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

THOMAS L. THOMPSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have a letter from F. M. Shippey, superintendent of schools for Freeport County, Ohio, who makes a statement that there are in the treasury of England certain papers bearing the stamps of the old celebrated stamp act of 1765, which are of interest in our colonial history. It evidently was intended, though a letter to me, to be a petition to the Senate, and I ask that it be received as such, and move that it be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Pensacola, Fla., in favor of the passage of the Lowell bankrupt bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 431) for the relief of Sallie A. Spence; and

A bill (S. 874) to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, title 72, in relation to guano islands.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5692) to adopt the revised international regulations for preventing collisions at sea; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed enrolled bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under authority of the United States, or any Department or any officer thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 200) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Mo., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report an amendment to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill in lieu of certain bills referred to the committee on the subject of appointing a special commissioner to visit the principal countries of Central and South America for the purpose of collecting information looking to the extension of American trade and commerce, &c. I report this amendment with a written report, which I ask to have printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California from the Committee on Foreign Relations reports an amendment intended to be proposed to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I report back from the same committee with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed the bill (S. 347) to authorize the appointment of a special commissioner to visit the principal countries of Central and South America for the purpose of collecting information looking to the extension of American trade and commerce and the strengthening of friendly and mutually advantageous relations between the United States and all other American nationalities.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not fully understand the former report just made by the Senator from California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the Senator from California from the Committee on Foreign Relations was an amendment providing for this matter to be put on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, and his written report explains the ground on which the recommendation of the committee proceeds. He also reports sundry bills upon the subject as not necessary to be passed in view of the amendment that he proposes to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. If there be no objection the bill will be indefinitely postponed. The bill just reported will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am also instructed by the same committee to report in favor of the indefinite postponement of the bill (S. 594) for the encouragement of closer commercial relationship and in the interest of and the perpetuation of peace between the United States and the Republics of Mexico and Central and South America and the Empire of Brazil.

The bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am also instructed by the same committee to report in favor of indefinitely postponing the bill (S. 1700) to authorize the appointment of three commissioners to visit the principal countries of Central and South America for the purpose of collecting information looking to the extension of American trade and commerce and the strengthening of friendly and mutually advantageous relations between the United States and all the other American nationalities.

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall ask that that bill be placed on the Calendar until I have had time to examine the substance of the amendment.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand that the amendment reported by the Senator from California will be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. MILLER, of California. It will be printed as a proposed amendment and the report will be printed as the report of a committee.

I am also instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1860) for the relief of Richard Phœnix, to report adversely thereon. I think as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] has taken a great interest in the bill and he is not present it had better be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. WILSON. The bill (S. 2008) to provide for the payment of the amounts that may be found to be due to postmasters under the act of March 3, 1883, and for other purposes, was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and has been considered by that committee. I am directed to report the provisions of that bill in the form of an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill making appropriations for the Post-Office Department, and I ask the reference of the proposed amendment to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reports an amendment intended to be proposed to the Post-Office appropriation bill. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2025) for the relief of John Ricketts; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2026) granting a pension to Elias Shelton; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 2027) for the relief of A. B. Norton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLATT. I introduce the bill by request and without committing myself to the principle of the bill in any way. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HILL introduced a bill (S. 2031) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HILL. I shall ask the consent of the Senate at some convenient time in a few days to submit some remarks upon the bill, and I ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 2032) to protect employés of railway corporations engaged in interstate commerce and in the transportation of freight by railways in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOWEN subsequently said: I understand that bills of the nature of the one I have just introduced have been referred to the Committee on Railroads. If that information is correct I should like to have the reference changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the reference will be changed. The Chair is not advised what the practice is.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 2033) providing for a writ of error in the cause of the heirs of Arredondo against the United States of America in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2034) to remove the political disabilities of Alfred Iverson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 5261) making an appropriation for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RANCHO DE NAPA GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII, Order of Business 231, being Senate bill 1232, which will now be laid before the Senate.

The bill (S. 1232) authorizing claimants to the Rancho de Napa, in Napa County, California, to prove up their title, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURT IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The bill (S. 209) to establish a United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. At the time that bill was reported from the Committee on Territories I indicated that there was a difference of opinion as to some of its provisions by certain members of the committee, myself holding some views with the minority, and it can hardly be considered under the five-minute rule. I therefore object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

ARMS FOR SOUTH CAROLINA.

The bill (S. 1412) authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms between the State of South Carolina and the Government of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. Is there a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. PLATT. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAMPTON February 15, 1884:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1412) authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the accounts for arms between the State of South Carolina and the Government of the United States, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

It appears from the papers in this case, furnished by the Secretary of War, that R. K. Scott, governor of South Carolina, sent the adjutant and inspector-general of the State, Franklin J. Moses, jr., to Washington in 1869 "to make requisition upon the United States Government for the quota of arms due this State and to receive and receipt for the same;" that, in pursuance of the order of Governor Scott, Moses made a requisition, and was notified by Col. T. J. Treadwell, then in charge of the Ordnance Bureau, that there was due to the State, on account of her quota of arms, the sum of $8,798.78. Upon receipt of this information, Moses wrote to General Dyer, Chief of Ordnance, that "the number of arms embraced in such quota would be entirely inadequate for the purposes for which the arms are desired by the governor;" and he asked that 10,000 Springfield muskets and the like number of sets of infantry accouterments should be issued to the State. This request was approved by the Secretary of War, and the arms were issued. The State was charged for these arms $124,000, and since their issue no arms have been issued to South Carolina except 120 Springfield rifles, for which she was charged $2,491.20.

In view of the fact that the act of April 23, 1808, directs an annual distribution of arms to the several States, and in consideration of the circumstances attending the unprecedented requisition of Governor Scott, by which the State has been deprived of her quota of arms since 1869, and will be deprived of it for many years to come, it seems to be but an act of equity that she should be relieved from the debt with which she is charged by the General Government. It will readily be perceived that if the Secretary of War has authority to issue to any State its quota of arms in advance, and should do so, as in the case of South Carolina, for thirty years, such State would not only be deprived of all the benefits which would accrue from the adoption of improved arms, but an enormous debt might be imposed on that State.

In order that all the facts connected with this case may be fully understoood, the papers submitted by the Secretary of War are appended to this report; and your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut desire that the accompanying papers shall be read?

Mr. PLATT. I do not.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust the account for arms between the State of South Carolina and the Government of the United States, and balance the same by so reducing the overcharge made against said State in A. D. 1869, under the act approved the 23d of April, A. D. 1808, and the several acts amendatory thereof, as that the amounts paid on said account by said State for the ten years last past be taken in full satisfaction of the same.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator who has charge of this bill what the effect of the bill will be upon the other States of the Union? There is an annual appropriation, as we know, for arms, which is distributed regularly among the States according to their quota of militia. Now, here is a readjustment of the account for arms furnished to South Carolina. Is it not the effect of this bill to take away from other States who are entitled to arms their proper proportion? Although some injustice may have been done to South Carolina, is it right now at this late day to take away from other States their proper quota of arms under the law of 1808?

Mr. HAMPTON. The passage of the bill will have no such effect as is contemplated by the Senator. The facts of the case are simply these: In 1869, when Scott was governor of South Carolina, he made a requisition through his adjutant-general for arms. When the adjutant-general came here he found that the annual quota of the State was about $4,000. He said that that would not be sufficient for the purpose that they had in view in South Carolina, and he asked for 10,000 rifles. They were given him, I think myself by a very great stretch of authority, but they issued arms for thirty years in advance to South Carolina. The consequence of that has been that we have received no arms from that day to this, and the State is now charged with about $60,000 of balance on the quota which was advanced in 1869. The bill simply proposes to wipe out that debt and to authorize the State to draw hereafter her quota.

I will state that a similar bill was passed unanimously last year by the Senate, and the report is a unanimous one from the Military Committee. I think there can be no objection to the bill if Senators will look into it.

Mr. PLATT. I got the impression from hearing the report read that the State of South Carolina had the arms which she was charged this $124,000 for and has them still. Now, what is this proposition? That she shall return them?

Mr. HAMPTON. The State has not the arms. They were sent to South Carolina at that time. As the militia was organized the colored troops got all the arms. Not a single arm was given to a white company in the State. The arms were very inferior and most of them have been lost. A few of them are there still. I will say that there are twelve or fifteen colored companies in South Carolina, one whole brigade in Charleston, and they are armed with those arms.

I think we ought to be entitled to our arms for the past twelve or fourteen years, but this only provides for the future. In the papers accompanying the report will be found a full statement of the case.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not understand from the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina what disposition was made of these arms. I understand there is an annual appropriation of $200,000 made for the distribution of arms among the different States under the act of 1808, and that in 1869 the properly constituted authorities of the State of South Carolina received a very large excess of the amount to which they were entitled, aggregating nearly $125,000. The allegation is not made in the report that the State did not receive the arms, nor is it accounted for whether they are there at the present time or not. But if this requisition was honored in 1869, then other States were deprived of the amount to which they were justly entitled, and if we now proceed to readjust the account upon the basis that the withholding of the amount due South Carolina for the last ten years shall be an equivalent for what she received in 1869, some other States are to be deprived of what they would be entitled to under succeeding quotas. I wish the Senator from South Carolina would state where these arms are.

Mr. HAMPTON. Very few are in the State.

Mr. INGALLS. That is not the fault of the United States Government.

Mr. HAMPTON. No.

Mr. INGALLS. The demand was made on the Government by the governor of the State of South Carolina, and in pursuance of the law the amount of arms specified in this report was delivered to the State. The fact that they are not there, or that there was a misappropriation, or that they were improperly distributed, or that they have been improperly taken care of since, imposes no additional obligation on the Government of the United States.

Mr. HAMPTON. As I said just now, I can not see how the balancing of this account can in the slighest degree affect the claim of any other State.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator, I believe, understands that there is an annual fixed appropriation made for this purpose.

Mr. HAMPTON. I was going on to state that by the law of 1808 there is an annual appropriation, and the law explicitly declares that the arms shall be annually appropriated to the States. While I do not mean to criticise the Secretary of War for his action, I think he exceeded his authority when he undertook to issue arms to a State for thirty years in advance. If he can do it for thirty years or ten years in advance, he might for one hundred years. We have been deprived in South Carolina since 1869 of the benefit of receiving any arms, so that we have had no improved arms. The arms that were given there, as I stated, were distributed to the negro militia in the State, and there are none of them in the State now except those which are in the hands of the regiments and companies of negro militia, and they are very creditable organizations. Not a single one of these arms passed into the hands of the white militia. In 1877, when I assumed the office of governor, we endeavored to recover these arms. We found very few of them except those that were placed in the hands of colored troops, and of course they were not taken from them, and the State has been deprived from that day to this of any issue of arms at all. We simply ask now that hereafter she may receive her quota. There is a bill reported by the Military Committee increasing that appropriation to $600,000, so that every State will be amply supplied under the new bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I doubt very much the policy of anticipating the annual distribution of arms among the States, but I rise to say that in my opinion it would be wise to repeal the act of 1808 providing for the distribution of arms. I do not believe there is any necessity for it; and there being no occasion for the purchase of arms and for the distribution of arms among the States in time of peace, I do not see why we should spend $600,000 as now proposed for arms to be distributed. I think under the circumstances, however, South Carolina ought to be relieved from the embarrassment in which she is placed in reference to these arms. It is well known—it is understood generally at least—that the object of securing these arms in advance of the time at which the State would be entitled to them was to arm one portion of the people of that State.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, the report to which we have been referred and which was not all read shows that there was due from South Carolina, taking the account of the money advanced for arms, $80,596.08 on the statement of the account for the arms furnished the State. The governor of South Carolina made a requisition on the 13th of July, 1869, upon the United States Government "for the quota of arms due the State for arming the militia." The adjutant-general of the State requested on behalf of the State of South Carolina that it might be "allowed to draw so many years' quota of arms in advance as will enable us to obtain from the United States 10,000 muskets as soon as possible, in order that we may be enabled to have them altered to breech-loaders at as early a day as practicable."

The date of that communication is July 17, 1869. That was a request of the State of South Carolina from its governor through its adjutant-general. In reply to that, the matter being referred to General Dyer, the brevet lieutenant-colonel and major of ordnance in charge of the bureau, Mr. Treadwell, reports that "there is due to the State of South Carolina, on account of her quota under the law for arming the militia, the sum of $8,798.78; and, if authorized, this department might issue arms to the extent asked for in advance of future quotas to become due from our surplus arms; in which case I would recommend the issue of Springfield rifle-muskets, which have been cleaned and repaired, and that the same be charged at the price of $7 each against future quotas to South Carolina."

Under that authority the State drew seventy thousand dollars' worth of muskets and fifty-four thousand dollars' worth of accouterments. In addition to that and since that time, as late as March 9, 1878, the State drew of Springfield rifles one hundred and twenty, to the amount of $2,160 and for other things enough to make $2,500. The result was that in 1879 they had overdrawn the amount due to the State under the law $80,596.08. There is no question but what the governor of that State drew from the United States, professedly in advance of the quota it would have received, large amounts of arms. There is no doubt that they were sent to the Springfield armory and were there changed, as desired by the governor of that State, into breech-loading guns, as good arms as there were in the United States. There is no pretense but that the governor, the accredited and proper authority of the State of South Carolina, drew from the General Government by special request this amount in advance of its quota; and the action of the governor whoever he was is binding to me, who am a strong State-rights man, as all Senators here know. I say the action of that governor whoever he was, whether the present Senator or his predecessor, is binding upon the State and in regard to this matter upon the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). It is the duty of the Chair to inform the Senator from Michigan that his five minutes have expired.

Mr. CONGER. For the purpose of having time for the further discussion of this matter I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill being objected to, goes over.

Mr. HAMPTON. May I ask the Senator from Michigan if he will let it retain its place on the Calendar, so that it shall come up at the next sitting and we shall have the opportunity then of examining all the documents?

Mr. CONGER. I shall be met with objection to going on with my remarks then, having spoken once.

Mr. HAMPTON. I shall ask unanimous consent to let the Senator speak as long as he pleases.

Mr. CONGER. Having of course the same right, if there should be a refusal of that request of the honorable Senator, to object to the consideration of the bill then as now, I am willing that it shall remain on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the bill being informally passed over, holding its place at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII? The Chair hears none.

CITADEL ACADEMY, CHARLESTON.

The bill (S. 1413) to empower the Secretary of War to audit the claim of the State of South Carolina for rent alleged to be due for the use and occupation of the Citadel Academy at Charleston was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. If that should be changed from "audit" to "examine" the claim, so that it shall not involve the idea of a settlement of it, I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. HAMPTON. This bill is framed, as I think, to meet the views of the Secretary of War. I have been in consultation with him, and the whole matter is left to him entirely. He has to pass upon the fact whether the building has been used, and, if so, what rent is due, and if rent is due, what amount should be paid, and he then reports to Congress.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that. This claim seems to have been from August, 1866.

Mr. HAMPTON. I will state for the information of the Senator that Judge Upton has examined the claim, and in a written communication, which was before the Military Committee, he says that a reasonable rent is due. We propose to let the Secretary of War, who will appoint a board, pass upon the question whether the rent is due and report all the facts to Congress.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I think the word "audit," in line 4, should be changed. That has a technical meaning. It is the function of an auditor of the Treasury to audit accounts. I prefer the use of the word "examine," and will move to substitute the word "examine" for "audit."

Mr. HAMPTON. I am not authorized to act for the committee, but as far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing that that change should be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CONGER, the title was amended so as to read:

A bill to empower the Secretary of War to examine the claim of the State of South Carolina for rent alleged to be due for the use and occupation of the Citadel Academy at Charleston.

BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME.

The bill (S. 1404) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in either the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. Let this go through.

Mr. HALE. If this will not take long I have no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. It will only take a few minutes.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. CONGER. There are propositions before the Senate for the establishment of branch homes for volunteer disabled soldiers in Michigan and in other portions of this country, and I desire that there shall be embodied in one bill whatever action may be taken in regard to the subject. I am especially anxious that the proposition for a branch of the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in Michigan should have early action; and if this bill goes over without prejudice, not losing its place, perhaps the committee will be able to report a bill to embody whatever is to be done.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Michigan will allow me to interrupt him.

Mr. CONGER. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to state that there have been petitions presented to the Military Committee for the location of soldiers' homes in specified States, among others the State of Michigan. One of those petitions was reported the other day from the Military Committee by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], not adversely but with the statement that the committee had taken action to the extent they are willing to go in the bill which had been reported; and the other day when the Senator from Michigan perhaps introduced some petition looking to the location of a home in that State, at my suggestion the petition was laid upon the table, for the reason that the Military Committee had already acted upon the subject as they thought. Now, if the Senator from Michigan desires this bill to be passed over until he can prepare some amendment looking to the location of a home in Michigan with a view of attaching it to this bill, there can be no objection that I know of.

Mr. CONGER. It is principally in reference to the location of a home in my own State that I desire delay.

Mr. HALE. Then let this bill go over and keep its place on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say in regard to that, if any such proposition as that referred to by the Senator from Indiana was made in my hearing it was with the understanding that Michigan was provided for as well as other States, for I can not conceive it possible that the committee having the subject in charge would leave that State out of any such proposition. Let the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. HARRISON. Before that is done I desire to say to the Senate that this bill is here without any written report from the Military Committee. It was in my charge, but was passed upon at an extra meeting of the committee held on a day when I had a meeting of my own Committee on Territories, and I was not present. It was brought to me by the direction of the Military Committee to report it, which I have done, but I did not accompany it with any written report.

Senators will find, if they will examine the last section of the bill, that it enlarges the scope of the law as it exists now with reference to all the homes as to the class of persons who may be taken to the homes. I mention this fact in order that the attention of any who choose to look at it may be called to it.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to add in this connection that my colleague and myself have received very numerous petitions from soldiers and posts of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to this matter, and it has been pressed upon our attention from time to time by letters that the subject should be brought before the Senate. I should be sorry to have action taken on this bill until an opportunity is presented to show the committee what we wish in regard to the State of Michigan.

Mr. ALLISON. Before we pass from this bill I desire to say that I also have received, with my colleague, many petitions respecting the establishment of a home in Iowa, but I have supposed that we could not secure a home in every State in the Union and that we should be obliged therefore to locate these homes in different localities throughout the Union. I have been rather disposed to accept the report of the Committee on Military Affairs giving a range wherein this additional home may be established so as to accommodate the soldiers of several States.

Mr. CONGER. That must be very satisfactory to the gentleman, because Iowa is one of the States mentioned in the bill for such a home. Michigan is not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this bill being informally passed over, holding its place on the Calender under Rule VIII? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5692) to adopt the revised international regulations for preventing collisions at sea was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to take up the naval appropriation bill at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed at this time to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 178, to insert under the head of "Bureau of Ordnance:"

For the construction or purchase of one torpedo-boat, after the best model of construction now in use, $55,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting," in line 189, after "receiving-ships," to strike out "for the civil establishment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 193, to increase the appropriation "for equipment of vessels" from $707,000 to $850,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the same clause, after the word "dollars," in line 194, to insert:

The coal for the Navy purchased under this appropriation shall be of the kind which may be preferred by the Secretary of the Navy, after an investigation by a suitable board of officers of the comparative merits of anthracite and bituminous coal for ordinary naval uses, and the price of said coals, and the readiness with which they may be procured in the ports of the world.

Mr. BECK. On this whole question I wish to ask the Senator from Maine, who is managing the bill, whether we have not some statements relative to the superiority of bituminous coal over anthracite coal and whether we have not also information that ought to be furnished in some way as to our want of a naval station and our absolute dependence for all sorts of coal on foreign countries, showing the necessity for these amendments. We use anthracite coal now, I believe, nearly altogether, which can not be had except in our own ports, and we have neither stations nor anything else outside of our own ports, except one or two in very remote parts of the world. I think some information should be given to the Senate on these points, either orally or in print. I want it in the RECORD for the benefit of the Senate and the House.

Mr. HALE. I will state the object sought to be reached by the amendment. During the war the Navy fell into the use almost exclusively of anthracite coal. Since that time the groove into which the Navy fell has been continued, and anthracite coal is used largely or almost exclusively by the Navy. It is not the opinion of naval authorities that I have consulted, and I may say of the Secretary, that anthracite coal is the best. I believe and he believes (and I think that is the sentiment generally) that the Navy would be better out of this groove that it has been running in, and should buy and consume the other coal. The bituminous coal is not quite as comfortable on board; it makes more smoke and smell, and therefore may not be a favorite with officers; but it is cheaper, more readily attainable, and the Secretary thinks he can use it with profit and advantage. He undoubtedly has the power at present to direct the purchase of bituminous coals wherever they can be reached; but a provision of law of this kind from Congress helps the head of the Department in getting the Department out of an old and established usage, gives him an authority and a prestige, something to back him, which is desirable. That is the reason why the clause has been put in.

We have but few naval stations anywhere on the face of the earth. There is one on the Sandwich Islands which is pretty badly out of repair and needs money spent upon it, and that is why the appropriation has been increased. There is one at the point of Lower California called Pichiluego and another at the San Juan Islands. These all need something in the way of repairs; they need a supply of coal; and the amount appropriated by the House of Representatives for these items the Department say is not sufficient. Therefore the Committee on Appropriations upon this presentation increased the appropriation and inserted this amendment, which I believe has been agreed to already, giving the Secretary some encouragement in taking hold of this question of the kinds of coal to be consumed by the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has not yet been agreed to. The Chair was putting the question when objection was made. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator please inform me, if he can, what kind of coal is now being used by the Navy? Is it anthracite or bituminous coal?

Mr. HALE. The Senator I presume was not present when I explained this matter. That was the statement I made on taking the floor before. It is anthracite. The Navy is running in that direction.

Mr. McPHERSON. And this provision is simply to give the Secretary of the Navy power to make investigation as to which would be the most suitable coal to use?

Mr. HALE. As I have said he can do so now undoubtedly, but this helps him in that direction.

Mr. McPHERSON. Inasmuch as the district producing anthracite coal is very limited and very small, and as the coal that we shall necessarily use very largely in our naval steamers must be obtained from other sources and in foreign ports and that mainly bituminous coal, and as the appliances necessary to burn bituminous coal must be entirely different from those used to burn anthracite, it would seem to me as though it was important, if it could be done, that the furnaces, &c., on board our steamers should be so arranged as to burn bituminous coal entirely.

Mr. HALE. That is what the Secretary desires to do, and that is what I desire he should do.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have not been present in the Chamber all the time, and I wish to know whether we have reached that part of the bill which begins at line 179.

Mr. HALE. We are on page 9, line 194.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the committee in relation to a provision from line 179 to line 181, inclusive:

For the construction or purchase of one torpedo-boat, after the best model of construction now in use, $55,000.

I ask would it not be wise to insert the words "after approval by the advisory board," inasmuch as all these matters relating to our ships, the purchase, repairs, &c., of ships are under the control and direction of the advisory board? Would it not be wise to have the construction or purchase of this torpedo-boat placed entirely under the advisory board?

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that. It is a thing that comes under the head of the Bureau of Ordnance. It is a specialty. I would not want anything done that would seem to imply any lack of confidence in the head of that bureau, who is, as the Senator knows, a very competent and faithful officer.

Mr. McPHERSON. I admit that.

Mr. BECK. I think we had better explain that paragraph as amended. I favored the amendment in regard to coal and the increase made by the committee in regard to all the items in the preceding clause. As was stated on the authority of Admiral Porter the other day, coal is now made contraband of war by the European nations. For that and other reasons I believe we ought to make arrangements in the furnaces of our new ships—and I understand it can be readily done without doing anything beyond changing the grate—to burn bituminous coal as well as anthracite, and very little expense will be added to their construction by this change so as to burn any of the various kinds of coal.

Mr. HALE. It is very easily done, at little expense.

Mr. BECK. It only involves the changing of the grate. The main thing to be considered is the absolutely helpless condition we are in in regard to this indispensable article. We can not to-day send an American steamship from the port of New York or New Orleans to San Francisco without being absolutely at the mercy of foreign nations for our supply of coal. That ought not to be. There is not a country on either side of the coast of South America or the West Indies where England has not her coaling stations. France has hers; and other nations have them. The people of the United States are at the mercy of the powers with whom they may have to contend in sailing from one part of our country to another part. We have not a coaling station anywhere until we reach lower California where we could get a pound of coal, except by the consent of foreigners, at the very time we might need it worst. We ought to make some arrangement such as other nations make, and which we can make just as easily as they can, whereby we can have coaling stations along the coast of South America, in Peru, Chili, and Brazil, as England, France, and other countries have, so that we can at least sail our own ships from the eastern to the western coast of the United States.

Without such indispensable adjuncts as coaling stations the idea of our becoming a warlike power is all nonsense. Years ago England, by commercial treaties with every country, established her workshops, her repair shops, her blacksmith shops, and coal-stations at convenient points, so that her ships of war can readily obtain supplies and be repaired. She sells coal to all the world as well as to us, while we have no facilities and no rights anywhere. Some steps ought to be taken if we intend to build and maintain a navy, or anything which presents the appearance of a navy, and at least be independent of foreign nations by having stations for coal, if nothing else.

I called the attention of the Secretary of the Navy to that matter the other day when he was in the committee-room, and he said that the facts I state now are true, and that they were important, and he would look into them carefully and make recommendations or suggestions at an early day as to what was best to be done in order to make ourselves reasonably independent of the powers with whom we may some time or other be at war, so that we may at least sail from one port of our own country to another.

I rose more for the purpose of making that statement than I did to say anything in regard to the amendment, which I approve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment from line 194 to line 200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 216, to insert, under the head of "Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting:"

For the civil establishment at navy-yards and stations, $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Yards and Docks," in the clause making appropriations "for general maintenance of yards and docks," in line 227, after the word "dredging," to strike out "postage on letters and other mailable matter on public service, and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, in line 235, after the word "navy-yards," to strike out "for the civil establishment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 237, to increase the appropriation "for general maintenance of yards and docks" from $220,000 to $250,000.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator who has charge of this bill why an increase has been deemed necessary by the Committee on Appropriations, in line 237, of $30,000 for the purposes provided in this clause of the House bill; and why there is an addition to the contingent expenses, in line 240, of another $10,000, and then for the civil establishment, placed in this bill by the amendment of the committee as an entirely separate affair, the sum of $24,000 additional is appropriated in lines 241 and 242? In short, why is the sum devoted here to the Bureau of Yards and Docks increased $60,000 by the Senate Committee on Appropriations over the House bill after it had been understood that every needed appropriation was put in for like purposes in the original bill?

Mr. HALE. The Bureau of Yards and Docks is what I may call the housekeeping establishment of the Navy. It has the control and custody and responsibility of the yards as divided into the several different bureaus. It has the keys; it has care of all the stock; it has the responsibility as to the buildings, the care and control of watchmen and their allotment, and everything of that kind, making it, as I have termed it, the housekeeping bureau of the Department. In the last ten years Congress has taken that important bureau and has cut it down from an annual appropriation of $800,000, gradually, to $200,000 in this bill as sent to us. For the last fiscal year that the returns are in the appropriations were $323,000, and all was expended and needed. The present year there will be spent when the year is out $250,000, and the bureau complains that it is pinched and wants another $100,000. The committee has given it in this bill $250,000, just what it had for the last year, which is less than a third of what it had ten years ago and about half what it had five years ago. It is a small sum; it will pinch the bureau. It will be hard work to do all the work of the different yards with this sum. Some buildings will be neglected, some work will not be done that perhaps ought to be done, but the committee was conservative and confined it to $250,000. That is the reason why this item has been increased from the House bill $30,000.

As to the civil establishments of the navy-yards, the last item of the appropriations for this bureau, that is the same appropriation it has had for years, and it is put here by itself as it was taken out of the general bill. The item for contingent expenses, $20,000, raised from $10,000, is the same that it was last year.

Mr. McPHERSON. But the Senator will observe that his committee have placed an appropriation for the civil establishment in a distinct and separate item by itself, whereas in the original bill provision was made for the civil establishment in the gross appropriation of $220,000.

Mr. HALE. No; it was not. The Senator will let me give him the history of that. The House went over these items and provided for the general expenses not only of this bureau but of others, and then afterward proceeded to insert the civil establishment but did not add to the amount. So the Senate committee, not adding to the general amount for this purpose, not deeming that wise, as I explained the other day, has taken out the civil establishment, which is clerical, and given to it what it has always had heretofore and which the House did not put in when it put the phrase in with the others.

Mr. McPHERSON. Am I to understand that all the amendments made by the Senate Committee on Appropriations to the House bill are found in the print before us in italics?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. I find on line 235, page 10, that provision is made for the civil establishment the same as for any other thing called for under the Bureau of Yards and Docks. I find that there has been an appropriation here of something over $60,000 added to the amount appropriated by the House. I find also in looking through the entire bill that there is no single department of the Navy where most extraordinary increases have not been made far in excess of anything I have ever witnessed before. For instance, we find here for the contingent expenses in one place a large increase, the civil establishment being removed from the general sum and placed in a separate item by itself, and a separate and distinct appropriation made for it, even after the original appropriation has been largely increased.

I fail to find in the Senator's statement in reply to my question any good ground, any good reason, to show that a want exists for this increase. The Senator states as a reason that we have reduced the appropriations for the Bureau of Yards and Docks from $800,000 ten years ago to $250,000 as proposed by this bill. The Senator should understand that ten years ago we were building up the navy-yards and to-day we are abandoning them. The Secretary of the Navy has recommended, I believe, or a board appointed by the Secretary has recommended, and I think it meets with his approval, that several of the navy-yards of the country should be entirely abandoned and given up. In short, we are informed that no improvements are taking place to-day in those yards which have been recommended to be abandoned. Consequently a less sum of money is needed. But here is a large appropriation made by the House for a specific purpose, covering all the objects that the Senate committee propose to make appropriations for, and yet the Senate committee in a separate, distinct item increase the House appropriation, and then separate the civil establishment from the general body of the bill, and make a large appropriation for that.

Mr. HALE. Now let me see if I can make the Senator understand this. In the first place I should like to know whether he would prefer that the civil establishments of the different bureaus or of the different departments should be put in these bills in a lump or whether the appropriations should be kept separate?

Mr. McPHERSON. I care nothing as to that, whether they be kept separate or put in a general mass.

Mr. HALE. Let me explain to the Senator, and then I think he will care. The civil establishment is clerical. It has always been complained that if any Department had the authority to expend an indefinite sum for clerical force the pressure would be too great upon it, and it would be increasing its clerical force. There is not any Department where we do not seek to limit the amount used for clerical force. We do not want general funds taken and given in addition to the specific salaries voted, and so everywhere we appropriate distinctively and specifically for civil establishments. That has been done always in the naval bill for years past, because it was looked upon as a fitting thing to confine these bureaus, and say just how much they shall spend for clerks and civil establishment.

This year the House in passing the bill made it up without the civil establishment at all, made it up without appropriating for it, made up its general clauses and fixed the sums, and when they had got through the bill attention was called to the fact that they had not put the civil establishments in anywhere, they had not provided for them, and so they put them in the body of the bill by name, but made no appropriation to cover their expenses; put them right in with the general fund, not providing for them otherwise, leaving it to the bureaus to take what they pleased from the general fund for the civil establishment. The Senate Committee on Appropriations does not believe in that, and it has taken out the civil establishment from the general fund and put it separately, where it has always been, and then has given the money that it has had heretofore for the civil establishment. We have simply rectified what the House has done. We should not want to see the civil establishment lumped with the other items, and I think we ought to know just how much money they are spending for clerks and for salaries in the different bureaus. I want this item of expense segregated.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from Maine, I think, will not deny that there has been an increase of $64,000 by the Senate amendments above the House appropriations for the Bureau of Yards and Docks. Now I should like to ask the Senator what the estimate of the Department was as to the amount required for the Bureau of Yards and Docks?

Mr. HALE. The appropriation of last year for the maintenance of yards and docks—which covers the items of the bill just read; I will not go over them in detail—was $264,000; civil establishment, $24,000; contingent expenses, $20,000; aggregating $308,000. The bill as reported by the committee this year is for maintenance of yards and docks, the items that occur here in the first part of the provision, $250,000; civil establishment, $24,000, the same as last year; contingent expenses, $20,000, the same as last year; making an aggregate of $294,000 against $308,000 last year.

Now let me say to the Senator that the only real increase over the House bill is the increase of the appropriation in line 237 from $220,000 to $250,000, which is $30,000; and the increase in line 240 from $10,000 to $20,000, which makes another $10,000; or $40,000 over the House bill. I do not consider the item of $24,000 for the civil establishment an increase, because there is nothing in the proceedings of the House which goes to show that they considered that they had appropriated for that in any way. They put it into the general fund without adding to it. But the bill has undoubtedly been increased $40,000, bringing the appropriations for this year up to $294,000 for this bureau against $308,000 last year.

Mr. McPHERSON. If I understand the Senator aright, he says there is nothing in the House bill to indicate that they had appropriated anything to the civil establishment. I have called his attention to line 235 where it is distinctly provided for.

Mr. HALE. Have I not just explained to the Senator how that got in; that after the House had proceeded and gone through the bill attention was called to the fact that they had not appropriated anywhere for the civil establishment, and then they directed that it be put into the general fund, but did not add anything to the fund in company with putting it in?

Mr. McPHERSON. Then the appropriation made by the Senate, asked for by the Department, is $64,000 greater than that given by the House, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are no votes in the negative; there is no quorum voting.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think if the question is again put by the Chair there will be a quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Chair will put the question again.

The question being again put the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 240, to increase the appropriation under "Bureau of Yards and Docks," "for contingent expenses that may arise at navy-yards and stations," from $10,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 240, under "Bureau of Yards and Docks," to insert:

For the civil establishment at navy-yards and stations, $24,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," in line 269, to increase the appropriation "for necessary repairs of naval laboratory, naval hospitals, and appendages, including roads, wharves, outhouses, sidewalks, fences, gardens, farms, and cemeteries," from $10,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I call the attention of the Secretary to line 244, page 11, so that the manuscript copy may be made right. At the end of line 244 it reads: "For surgeons, necessaries for vessels in commission," &c. The word "surgeons" should be in the possessive case, "surgeons'." The comma has been dropped down. It is: "For surgeons' necessaries." It is not "For surgeons, necessaries."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that correction will be made.

Mr. HALE. The Secretary will see to it that the manuscript copy is put right.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Bureau of Provisions and Clothing," in the clause making appropriations "for provisions for the seamen and marines," after the word "dollars," in line 278, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That all enlisted men and boys in the Navy, attached to any United States vessel or station and doing duty thereon, and naval cadets, shall be allowed a ration, or commutation thereof in money, under such limitations and regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 290, to increase the appropriation "for contingent expenses" of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing from $30,000 to $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 290, under "Bureau of Provisions and Clothing," to insert:

For the civil establishment, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Construction and Repair," in line 301, after the word "drawing-room," to strike out "and for the civil establishment;" in line 302, after the word "million," to strike out "and twenty" and insert "five hundred;" in line 303, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which sum $100,000 shall be immediately available;" and in line 304, after the word "available," to strike out "and this amount shall be apportioned in monthly installments during the next fiscal year; and the apportionment shall be adhered to, except in some emergency;" so as to read:

For preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; preservation of materials; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and for general care, increase, and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair, and incidental expenses, namely, advertising, foreign postage, telegrams, photographing, books, plans, stationery, and instruments for drawing-room, $1,500,000, of which sum $100,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 316, under "Bureau of Construction and Repair," to insert:

For the civil establishment, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Steam-Engineering," in line 327, after the word "instruments," to strike out "and for the civil establishment, seven hundred and sixty" and insert "one million fifty;" so as to read:

For repairs, completion, and preservation of machinery and boilers, including steam-steerers, steam-capstans, steam-windlasses, &c., in vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase and preservation of all materials and stores; purchase, fitting, and repair of machinery and tools in the navy-yards and stations; wear, tear, and repair of machinery and boilers of naval vessels; incidental expenses, such as foreign postages, telegrams, advertising, freight, photographing, books, stationery, and instruments, one million fifty thousand dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, line 329, after the word "dollars," to strike out the following words:

And the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $1,000,000 made by the act approved March 3, 1883, for engines and machinery for the double-turreted ironclads be, and the same is hereby, reappropriated and made available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, for the purposes enumerated in this paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 342, under "Bureau of Steam-Engineering," to insert:

For the civil establishment, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Increase of the Navy," in line 375, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That 20 per cent. of the amounts appropriated in the last three preceding paragraphs for the completion of the three new steel cruisers and one dispatch-boat shall be available immediately.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine whether the amounts here appropriated are sufficient under the contract to complete the cruisers and the machinery for the same?

Mr. HALE. Yes. These are the amounts that added together make up the total of the limit, and are intended, as is incorporated into the bill, for the completion. It is found that 20 per cent. of these sums can be used to advantage between now and the 1st of July, and so we have put in, nobody objecting thus far, that provision. It is to complete them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 379, to insert:

To complete the ordnance outfit of the three new steel cruisers and one dispatch-boat, $400,000.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Maine requested me to suggest the following amendment: Strike out "$400,000" and insert "$500,000." The subcommittee desire to have that done after a re-examination of the question. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves to amend the amendment by striking out "4" and inserting "5," so as to make the sum $500,000.

Mr. BECK. Not being able to answer very thoroughly some of the questions that were propounded by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], and others, a day or two ago, on yesterday morning, at my request, Commodore Sicard was sent for and appeared before the subcommittee. He gave us full information in regard to the guns for the new cruisers, their quality and number, besides much other useful information. He called our attention to a letter of the Secretary of the Navy, addressed to Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, chairman of the committee, in which he sets forth an estimate (Exhibit A, on page 21) showing the amount of money he had on hand from the appropriation for the current year and the amount which he would require to be appropriated by this bill for the next fiscal year in order to complete the armament of these ships, making a total amount of $449,992. On page 23 he furnishes an additional estimate, and on page 22 gives the reasons why that is necessary. He says, on page 22: "Since the original estimates for the cost of the armament of the steel cruisers were made changes have taken place in their secondary batteries, resulting in an additional obligation of about $54,000, and it was necessary to place this additional order immediately, otherwise the secondary batteries would not be ready in time for the ships. Thus, in any event, the $54,000 will be urgently needed to meet obligations already incurred in accordance with the act of Congress of March 3, 1883."

He proceeds to give other reasons, and then furnishes the appended Exhibits A and B, on page 23, showing the amounts required during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, for completing the armament of the steel cruisers to be $503,992.

Mr. HALE. Will not the Senator either read that or have that table put into the RECORD?

Mr. BECK. Exhibit A and Exhibit B had better be handed to the Reporter, to show exactly what is required.

The exhibits referred to are as follows:

EXHIBIT A.

Two hundred and thirty-four thousand dollars allotted to the Bureau of Ordnance from the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, for commencing the armament of the steel cruisers, divided as follows:

|---|---|
| Machine-cannon, ammunition, &c | $149,000 |
| Steel for 11 6-inch B. L. rifles | 56,100 |
| Steel for 4 8-inch B. L. rifles | 27,934 |
| Total | 233,034 |
| Not allotted | 966 |

EXHIBIT B.

Showing the amounts required during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, for completing the armament of the steel cruisers.

|---|---|
| Contracts for construction of 11 6-inch guns | $39,600 |
| Contracts for the construction of 4 8-inch guns | 34,000 |
| Steel for 4 8-inch guns | 27,934 |
| Steel for 9 6-inch and 2 5-inch guns | 54,000 |
| Labor on 9 6-inch guns in the navy-yards | 14,000 |
| Labor on 4 8-inch guns in the navy-yards | 13,000 |
| Labor on 2 5-inch guns in the navy-yards | 11,000 |
| Carriages for 20 6-inch, 8 8-inch and 2 5-inch guns | 143,000 |
| Ammunition and magazine equipments | 85,220 |
| Gatling guns, small arms, ammunition, &c | 60,678 |
| Torpedo search-lights and plant | 21,560 |
| Total | 503,992 |

This amount of money will fully complete the armament of the four ships that are now under contract and will furnish eight 8-inch guns, twenty 6-inch guns, and two 5-inch guns, making in all thirty guns needed for these cruisers.

The commodore further explained some of the things we were discussing the other evening. For instance, he said in substance that the forgings, as they are called, for the 8-inch guns are all made in England. The forgings consist of the tubes, the jackets, and the rings. We have no machinery in this country capable of making proper forgings for guns of that size. The 8-inch guns are 22 feet long and weigh 27,800 pounds. They use a charge of 125 pounds of powder and carry a 250-pound projectile, the initial velocity of which is 2,000 feet to the second, and their range from five to six miles. Of those they are having five made at Whitworth's establishment, at Manchester, and three by Messrs. Campbell, of Sheffield. The 6-inch guns are 16 feet long. They use a charge of 50 pounds of powder and carry a 100-pound shot. The initial velocity of that projectile is 2,000 feet per second, and the range the same as of the 8-inch guns. They are all being made in America. We have hammers and plant sufficient to make them, and guns of that size are being made here very well.

He made another statement in regard to these guns which has much to do with their power. The great length of the gun enables them to make use of a new character of powder. The most delicate experiments are being made to test the expansive power of the powder to be used, so as to distribute its explosive force through the whole length of the 22-foot 8-inch gun, so that all of it will be burned when the shot reaches the muzzle and not before. These are costly experiments, for which a large amount of money must be expended. He said that one of the 6-inch guns was now in use, and had been experimented with satisfactorily.

The Senator from Delaware inquired the other day whether we had any now in use. One of the 6-inch rifled breech-loading guns is now in position, and the tests made with it have been very satisfactory.

Mr. BAYARD. Only one?

Mr. BECK. Only one. Two of the 8-inch breech-loading rifles will be ready for use early in the fall. The material will be all on hand very soon; they are being finished at the navy-yard in Washington.

I asked the commodore other questions which were talked about on this floor the other evening. We have thirty 5 and 6 inch breech-loaders now in the Navy, the converted Parrott gun. The Army has about twenty-three, he thought, but he was not very positive about that. They have about fifty muzzle-loading 8 inch rifles, converted from smooth-bores, now in use in the Navy. I asked him furthermore what was the cost of these guns here and abroad, and this is the answer he sent me by telegraph:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., April 9, 1884.

To Hon. JAMES B. BECK, Senate:

English 6-inch gun, $5,800 without freight; English 8-inch gun, $10,400 without freight; German 6-inch gun, $4,750 without freight; German 8-inch gun, $13,000 without freight; American 6-inch gun, $9,500 without freight; American 8-inch gun, $15,500 without freight; all made by private establishments.

SICARD.

You will observe that while the German 6-inch gun costs less than the English 6-inch gun, the German 8-inch gun costs a great deal more than the English 8-inch gun. Our people are prepared to make 6-inch guns, but not yet prepared to make 8-inch guns; but the cost of both classes is very much greater here than in Europe.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I understood the Senator to say that they had estimated that the cost of an 8-inch gun in this country would be $15,000, and that they are prepared to construct them.

Mr. BECK. They are not, because they have not the plant or the hammers or any of the heavy material necessary as yet; but those matters were all spoken about here the other evening. None of us seemed to be very accurate, and at my request Commodore Sicard gave me this information. The committee agreed that if we intended to finish these guns promptly, as I think we ought in order to complete the armament of the four cruisers at the earliest possible moment, it was proper to give the Department all the money it needed to complete them, and to make immediately available whatever sum they think they can use between now and July. The Commodore further said that 100-ton guns use a charge of powder not far from 600 pounds, and that the projectile weighs about a ton.

This is all I care to say about the amendment. We may have to give the $503,000 asked for, but $500,000 in round numbers we assumed would complete the armament for the four ships now under contract.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, for I desire to appropriate the money needed to construct these cruisers under the contract, to complete the steam-machinery, to complete the batteries, to complete the masts and other work, in short every item of expense, no matter what it is, to the most minute particular concerning these ships. I desire to have an appropriation of money in order that they may be completed at once within the terms of the contract as to time, and that the money you pay for them may be made immediately available. All that I want done. I wish nothing done to retard action upon them, and if the committee have not reported the necessary amount of money I hope it will be stated now, in order that the Senate may take action upon any increased amount needed; but as to continuing the construction of like ships until these are tested I shall have something more to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 382, to insert:

To enable the President to strengthen the naval establishment of the United States the sum of $2,500,000 is hereby appropriated, to be expended as follows and under the following limitations: For the construction of one cruiser of 4,500 tons displacement, one cruiser of 3,000 tons, one dispatch-vessel of 1,500 tons, two heavily armed gunboats of 1,500 tons each, and one light gunboat of 750 tons, and one gunboat, not to exceed 900 tons, to be built on plans and specifications to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy, and under his supervision and directions, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy; one steel ram, as recommended by the first naval advisory board, November 7, 1881; one cruising torpedo-boat, advocated by the same board and by the present advisory board in its memorandum of November 21, 1882; and two of the harbor torpedo-boats recommended by said first board and in the report from the Bureau of Ordnance of November 1, 1883, all of which are recommended in the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy. And, under existing law, it shall be the duty of the advisory board appointed in conformity with an act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, approved August 5, 1882, to advise and assist the Secretary of the Navy, in his office or elsewhere, in all matters referred to them by him relative to the designs, models, plans, specifications, and contracts for said vessels in all their parts, and relative to the materials to be used therein and to the construction thereof, and especially relative to the harmonious adjustment, respectively, of their hulls, machinery, and armament; and they shall examine all materials to be used in said vessels, and inspect the work on the same as it progresses, and have general supervision thereof, under the direction of said Secretary. But said board shall have no power to make or enter into any contract nor to direct or control any officer of the Navy, the chief of any bureau of the Navy, or any contractor. Neither of the vessels hereby authorized to be built shall be contracted for or commenced until full and complete detail drawings and specifications thereof, in all its parts, including the hull, engines, and boilers, shall have been provided or adopted by the Navy Department, and shall have been approved, in writing, by said board, or by a majority of the members thereof, and by the Secretary of the Navy; and after said drawings and specifications have been provided, adopted, and approved as aforesaid, and the work has been commenced, or a contract made for it, they shall not be changed in any respect, when the cost of such change shall in the construction exceed $500, except upon the approval of said board, or a majority of the members thereof, in writing, and upon the written order of the Secretary of the Navy; and if changes are thus made, the actual cost thereof and the damage caused thereby shall be ascertained, estimated, and determined by said board; and in any contract made pursuant to this act it shall be provided in the terms thereof that the contractor shall be bound by the determination of said board, or a majority thereof, as to the amount of the increased or diminished compensation said contractor shall be entitled to receive, if any, in consequence of such change or changes. And for the construction of all which vessels and their armament the Secretary of the Navy shall invite proposals from all American ship-builders and builders of machinery who shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy that within three months from the date of the contract their ship-yards will be equipped for building and repairing iron and steel steamships, and constructors of marine engines, machinery, and boilers; and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to construct said vessels and procure their armament at a total cost for each not exceeding the amounts estimated by the naval advisory board; and in the event that such vessels, or any of them, shall be built by contract, such building shall be under contract with the lowest and best responsible bidder or bidders, made after at least sixty days' advertisement, published in five of the leading newspapers of the United States, inviting proposals for constructing said vessels, subject to all such rules, regulations, superintendence, and provisions as to bonds and security for the due completion of the work as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; and no such vessel shall be accepted unless completed in strict conformity with the contract, with the advice and assistance of the naval advisory board, and in all respects in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 5, 1882, except as they are hereby modified; and the authority to construct the same shall take effect at once: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall utilize the national navy-yards, with the machinery, tools, and appliances belonging to the Government there in use, in the building of said ships, or any parts thereof, as fully and to as great an extent as the same can be done with advantage to the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just rendered.

Mr. BECK. I submit that the amendment just read is new legislation, and not in order under the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the amendment is in order, for the reason that it is a provision like the provisions in all the appropriation bills for increasing the establishment the bill provides for, as an appropriation bill in respect of the Treasury Department provides for more clerks, provides for new furniture, and all things that relate to the subject of the bill and the execution of the purpose of the establishment. The Chair therefore feels obliged to rule that this amendment is not general legislation within the sense of the sixteenth rule.

Mr. BECK. Then I suppose under that ruling we might provide for building a hundred new cruisers as an amendment to this appropriation bill, although there is no existing law on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think that the number of cruisers is affected by the rule.

Mr. BECK. I just desired to know what power an appropriation committee has. I had been taught to believe heretofore that no new legislation could be proposed on an appropriation bill, and I am very sure that the present occupant of the chair held us to a very strict accountability, and not only did not allow legislation on an appropriation bill, but not even an amendment to a House provision containing legislation. But I assume the Chair knows more about the rules than I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journals as to analogous amendments at former sessions, and finds himself, as he thinks, fully supported. The distinction is a very broad and obvious one between the general legislation named in the rule and a provision of this character. "General legislation," in the general sense (there are exceptions, however), is legislation that is permanent and regulates the conduct of affairs, and does not exhaust itself of its own force, as every item or provision in appropriation bills properly does.

This amendment is to provide for doing an act which when once done the statutory part of it is entirely exhausted and the law is no longer in force; it has been executed. That is widely different from a regulation even in respect of the conduct of officers of the Navy, which regulation would be a general provision that would continue in force until repealed. The Chair therefore thinks, however great the enactment of the subject is, that within the rule it is in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. The President pro tempore was not in the chair yesterday when I asked a question of the Senator in charge of the bill in relation to this amendment. I asked him whether the language of the proposed amendment was in fact the same as that of a bill which the Senate had passed at the present session, and he replied in the affirmative. Looking at Rule XVI, respecting amendments to appropriation bills, we find that—

No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session.

The facts of the present case are that the Senate did pass at the present session a bill identical in language with the amendment now proposed to be ingrafted upon this appropriation bill. Therefore, it seemed to me to be one of the exceptions referred to by the word "unless;" but if that exception had not been contained in the rule, it would have been in violation of the rule which forbade an amendment which added a new item of appropriation; that it did add new legislation, and that it did add a new item of appropriation to the bill.

On that ground I said I was satisfied that it was within the rule; but the Senator went further and he said something in concurrence with that which has fallen from the Chair; that is, that in effect it was not a new subject-matter, but that this being a naval appropriation bill it was competent for the Committee on Appropriations not simply to add increased amounts, but to add new items. In that reading I did not concur, for it seemed to me very plain that but for the especial language of this rule which excepted acts or resolutions which had previously been passed by the Senate during that session, a reorganization of the Navy or the creation of an entire navy would certainly not have been in order under the rules of the Senate upon an appropriation of money to support and maintain an existing navy.

The Chair, as I understand, however, has made the decision that it is competent, irrespective of the limitations of the rule, for the Appropriations Committee, for the Army necessarily as well as for the Navy, to increase by the number of war ships and the officers and crew necessary for them, or for the Army by regiments necessary, upon an appropriation bill, and that this can be done under the present rule of the Senate.

Of course the great matter is to understand what the rules are and to have an adjudication of them, in order that legislation may be conducted under them, or that the rules may be modified should the Senate find their working improper. I merely desire to say that yesterday when this matter was referred to I agreed to the fact that this amendment was in order under the rule only because it was expressly excepted by the language of the rule; but submitting to the decision, as I do, I can not bring my mind to concur that it is proper for the Committee on Appropriations to add an indefinite number of war ships, an indefinite number of regiments, an indefinite supply and creation of any force, to a bill that has come from the House appropriating money under existing law for the Army or Navy as it stood at the time.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks, if the Senator from Maine will pardon the Chair, that the construction of the rule is precisely the same as if this main provision had been one to buy a single gun or a cartridge or any other thing for the use of the Navy, with provisions as to how and what price and in what way and what kind of gun or cartridge should be procured; and that the large magnitude and importance of the subject does not affect the application of the law of the Senate to the question. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I am very glad to have the support of the Senator from Delaware as to the amendment being in order, whatever may be his reason. I call his attention now to another consideration, taking its rise in the clause that he has read, which provides that an amendment may be in order if it is made to carry out "an act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session." I call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to that provision in our rule as bearing upon a difficulty which he indicated yesterday existed in his mind in reference to coercing the House. Does not the language of our rule, deliberately adopted by us, exclude the idea that by putting any bill that we have passed on an appropriation bill we mean to coerce the House? Do we not generally commit ourselves by this rule, which the Senator has given here, to the proposition that when we have passed a bill or a resolution we may take that same bill or resolution and put it on an appropriation bill, and that the House can raise no question upon that?

Mr. BAYARD. That really seems to be the sensible construction to be given to the words of the rule.

Mr. HALE. Then, setting aside the question of order, is this not a reasonable thing for us to do in the relations of the two Houses? I want to remove, if I can, the feeling the Senator has that the Senate is now doing anything that may look like coercing the House. I agree fully with him that that can not bedone by either House, but I do think, and I hope he will support me in this, that it is legitimate and fair and not encroaching upon the other House to put on this appropriation bill this amendment, which our rule allows us to do, simply to bring the matter before the other House.

Mr. BAYARD. I remember very well that in 1876 I was a member of a committee of conference upon an important appropriation bill. There had been a long contest between the two Houses as to many items of that bill, and I remember we were in session by night as well as by day for two or three weeks in endeavoring to settle it; finally it was settled.

But a bill had passed both Houses reducing the salary of the President of the United States, of course after the expiration of the term of the then incumbent, General Grant, to $25,000. General Grant had vetoed that bill, much to my satisfaction and with my entire approval; and the veto message lay upon the table of the House in which the bill had originated. The House of Representatives passed an amendment to the appropriation bill which was in form and substance the bill which the President had vetoed, and by tacking it upon the appropriation bill brought it again to the Senate, and of course it was proposed to send the general appropriation bill to the President with that measure upon it which he had vetoed in a separate form.

Against that I protested in committee, out of committee, on the floor of the Senate, and everywhere. He had exercised his constitutional right. If the House wanted to exercise theirs let them summon two-thirds and overcome him if they could, and if they did not think he had done exactly what he had a right to do, he was responsible to the people for his action. When the appropriation bill came up here to the Senate such a rule as this was not to my knowledge in existence in either House, nor do I think this was the rule of the Senate prior to the last revision.

Mr. FRYE. Yes; but there is no such rule in the House.

Mr. BAYARD. I know that in the House they did assume to ingraft general legislation upon appropriation bills. The Senate has refused to recognize such a right, and I think it ought in all cases. Certainly the President of the United States, one of them, within a few years has vetoed an appropriation bill on account of the improper association of general legislation upon the bill, and stated that to be his reason for it.

I do not find under the rule an objection to placing upon this appropriation bill an "act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session." There might be a manifestly improper association of measures, that is to say, something not germane to the bill, but yet it seems to me under this rule it might go on.

So you might take a bill that has passed the Senate and tack it to an appropriation bill and send it to the other House. I might approve or disapprove of the expediency or the propriety of such an act, but I do not deny that it is within the rules of the Senate, and therefore it may be done.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] very frankly gave his reasons yesterday for desiring this measure to be sent a second time to the House of Representatives. It has gone there once in a separate form. It is to be sent there again associated with the general appropriations for the Navy, and the rules of the Senate say that may be done. At least I could put no other construction upon the language which I read here, and I understand the Chair finds additional reasons for authorizing it to be done besides the reason I can see in the rule. One reason is enough.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Maine will pardon the Chair lest the Chair should forget it, the Chair has merely decided the point of order raised by the Senator from Kentucky and under the third section of Rule XVI. That is all the opinion the Chair has given.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Delaware will find in clause 3 of Rule XVI a requirement that whatever amendment is offered shall be "germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill," which applies to clause 1 as much as to clause 3.

Mr. BAYARD. Do you not think there might be a collision between the two, a confusion as to that? If all general appropriation bills shall not be amendable unless, and then the exception is made in which they shall be, it seems to me that carries its own force. Or does the Senator suppose that is controlled by the third section of the rule?

Mr. FRYE. I suppose the third clause would control it, which says, "Nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received."

Mr. BAYARD. I do not suppose—and I will not imagine an improbable case—that the Senate would wish to ingraft a wholly incongruous subject upon an appropriation bill. There is no incongruity between a supply for the Navy and the increase of a single ship or some direction given to the expenditure of a fund The subject-matter is the same; but whether you can in an appropriation bill take legislation of a general nature and generally control the subject which is appropriated for is in my opinion something that the laws of the Senate were intended to prevent; and I am surprised now to find that the exception does exist to the extent that the act, supposing it to be germane as to the general subject, which has passed the Senate at the same session can be ingrafted, whether it is general or special legislation, but certainly new legislation, upon an appropriation bill.

But the language that I addressed to the Senator from Maine yesterday was to avoid any suggestion upon the part of the Senate that they thought they would put their bill in a more impressive form before the other branch of Congress; that is, by sending it attached to an appropriation bill instead of sending it separately and by itself. I do not think they do; not a particle. I think that the Navy as it is, the officers as they stand, are entitled under law and under the necessities of our Government to be supported; and whether as to new matters not then in existence there shall be a difference of opinion between the two Houses, that is a question to be relegated to another forum and not to be made the subject of wrangle at the cost of the existing Navy. I understand the Senator from Maine concurs with me in that view.

Mr. HALE. Yes, I certainly do. I agree fully with the Senator from Delaware that there should be the utmost courtesy and regard for courtesies between the two Houses. Nothing should be done by either House knowingly that is in any way a monition, to say nothing of a menace, to the other; but either body under the rules has the right to put on measures in order to call the attention of the other House to them and in order that the two Houses may if possible get together and settle them in a conference or by vote; nothing more.

Mr. BAYARD. I will remark that not only should there be courtesy, which of course is the great lubrication of all intercourse between men and between bodies of men, but there should be the strictest consideration for the rights of the respective Houses, which are certainly independent and coequal.

Mr. BECK obtained the floor.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from Kentucky yields to me for a few moments, that I may say what I wish to say in reply to the Senator from Maine, and it will only take me a moment.

I care nothing about what the rules of the Senate provide as to the power of the Senate to attach this kind of legislation to an appropriation bill, but considering the action the Senate has already taken, having passed a bill of like character and sent it to the other House, which I suppose has been referred to the appropriate committee of the House, and upon which, as I understand, if it is proper in this place to refer to that body, the judgment of the House is not yet concluded, it is now proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to attach a like bill to an appropriation bill, and, as the Senator from Maine says, again call the attention of the House to it.

In my opinion no greater discourtesy could ever be given to the House of Representatives than that proposed by this sort of legislation. It is an indignity, a menace to the House, and I believe it will there be treated as such and characterized as it deserves. What is the result? If the bill which has been passed by the Senate and sent to the other end of the Capitol does not receive the favorable consideration of that body it ceases to agitate either House of Congress; but here is the same measure of legislation attached to an appropriation bill—I will not say for the purpose, but it will result in getting up a contest between the two Houses with respect to that measure of legislation, and, as in times past, the Democratic party will be again charged—the time is not very long gone when the Democratic party of Congress were charged—with an attempt to starve the Government. Now, I suppose we shall be liable to the same charge in case we refuse to give the needed appropriation for the naval establishment which is contained in this bill. I hope and trust, however, the House of Representatives will never accept this bill with this amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. The other House have passed this appropriation bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly, the House have passed the appropriation bill giving needed supplies to the Department; but the Senate must also take action upon it. But the Senate does more. It deliberately proceeds to affix to the bill a measure already passed and now in the possession of the other House and says, "We will go into a committee of conference upon that question and hold you to the work if it takes all summer. We know we can not get it in any other way, and we mean to have it. Chandler shall have the money in spite of your unwillingness."

Before the Senator from Kentucky proceeds I wish to ask one more question of the Senator from Maine. I understood him to say yesterday upon a question being asked by the Senator from Delaware that this amendment was an exact transcript of the bill we passed authorizing the building of the new cruisers. Am I right?

Mr. HALE. I said that the bill which we passed for the new cruisers went from the Senate to the other House and there lies upon the Speaker's table. It is not printed under the rules of the House until it is referred to a committee. It has never been printed; but I sent over and had a copy made of it. I have not myself, as I said yesterday, compared this provision with the bill, but I have no reason to believe that it in any way differs. It is substantially the same. If it is found that in any way it does differ materially, of course that can be adjusted; but I know of no difference.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to call the attention of the honorable Senator to the fact that the bill that originally passed, if my memory serves me right, proposed to build one cruiser of 4,500 tons of the Chicago type; it proposed to build other cruisers of the Boston and Atlanta type; it proposed to supplement that by other vessels enumerated in the bill. He will see by reference to the proposed legislation now that it makes no allusion to either the Boston or Atlanta type or the Chicago type of vessels. Do I understand that the Senator, in connection with distinguished authorities upon this subject, has decided finally that it is unsafe to proceed with the construction of vessels of that type, and that he leaves the question entirely open to such new decision, such new judgment, as may be formed by the present advisory board?

Mr. HALE. There has been no change in that regard. It is just as it was in the bill that we passed. There were no restrictions in that bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. I supposed there were.

Mr. HALE. No, sir. The debate showed and the investigation showed what the purpose was of building under that general type; but there are no restrictions. It is left to the advisory board.

Mr. McPHERSON. The examination before the Committee on Naval Affairs, both of the Secretary of the Navy and of the advisory board, all went to show that the vessels were to be constructed exactly upon the type of the vessels now under construction.

Mr. HALE. Perhaps not exactly, but substantially.

Mr. McPHERSON. Substantially. I will adopt that word, as it seems to be preferred. I objected then and I object now most strenuously to the appropriation of any sum of money, however great or however small, to duplicate vessels now under construction, or to make any new experiments in vessels until those vessels are completed and their worthiness as sea-going vessels is first demonstrated. I want to see the actual vessel afloat, her machinery in motion, and her capacity to perform the service for which she is intended thoroughly and fully demonstrated, under the contracts, for the fulfillment of which we have appropriated the needed sums of money to-day in this bill, for the construction of the hulls, the completion of the machinery, for the armament of the vessels with suitable apparatus; in short, for every item of expense to the most minute particular. For one, I voted for those appropriations because I wished to have the vessels completed within the period of time named in the contract. If the terms of the contract are fulfilled by the first day of next February we shall have the ships completed. This gives us abundance of time during the next session of Congress to make appropriations to duplicate them, and we shall have the actual vessel afloat; we shall then know something as to the qualifications of the ship, and not go on with experiment after experiment by incompetent men, squandering the public money as it is now proposed to do.

We know not whether the vessels they propose to build to-day will sink or swim when built. They are after no known type of vessels. The machinery is a departure from everything to-day employed in naval vessels; and I claim it is the duty of the Senate to go slowly and first see whether the money we have already appropriated will be used in a way that will be for the benefit of the country.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I raised the question of order because the rules of the Senate have been generally regarded as being quite stringent in regard to amendments of this sort. I knew it would be overruled, but I desired to have it distinctly understood what the powers of the Committee on Appropriations are. The President of the Senate announces that we might have amended the bill by proposing to build a hundred ships just as well as seven. It is now decided to be perfectly in order, and I assume, under the rule, that we could have said in the amendment how they should be built. We could submit an amendment that these seven vessels shall be built by Mr. Roach and that nobody else shall have a right to bid; indeed, they might as well not be empowered to bid, because, as the Senator from Delaware said, when the contracts were given out for the four cruisers now being built, that nobody else can get the same inspections that he can, at least they so believed. The gentleman at the head of the Navy Department understands Mr. Roach's affairs well, and doubtless has great confidence in him. He was his lawyer and his agent for years, and he understands the value of Mr. Roach's services in a great many regards, no doubt, and appreciates his fitness to build ships. Perhaps it would be as well to insert in this amendment at once that Mr. Roach is to build the seven new vessels. That would be in order, I understand; it relates to the subject; we can direct how they shall be built, who shall build them, and what we shall pay him. I suppose we could properly give him a good margin of a hundred thousand or two hundred thousand dollars, and provide that Mr. Roach shall contribute 10 per cent. of the amount for campaign purposes in the interest of the public service and to promote the general welfare. That will cover it if nothing else will.

The rules mean that the Appropriations Committee can do anything it likes. I always knew the only rule of the Senate, the only one I ever saw enforced, was that whatever the majority of the Senate wanted done it did. A majority of the Senate, I presume, wants to give Mr. Roach a new contract to build seven more steel cruisers at any price he likes, and the Secretary, his former agent and attorney, is now in a good position to give it to him. The navy-yards will doubtless be placed in a condition to be very valuable political auxiliaries next fall, and the House of Representatives is to be coerced. You may call it by some other name if you please, but we say to them, "Agree to this, or we will keep you here all summer." Senators have comfortable residences here, many of them at least, and no elections to attend to this fall. The members of the other House will have to go home to appear before their people. We say to them, "We have sent you a bill once proposing to build seven ships, and you will not pass it. Now we put that proposition on an appropriation bill and we will keep you here all summer unless you agree to it."

That is the meaning of this amendment. Under the ruling of this morning I assume that when a court-house or a custom-house or a post-office is provided for in an appropriation bill the committee can say, "Yes, we will build this custom-house, we will build this post-office, we will build this court-house; but we will amend the bill so as to build one in the towns where each one of us lives. We can not get a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and there are nine of us on the Committee on Appropriations, and we live in different towns; none of us have any public buildings of any sort, neither a custom-house, post-office, nor court-house; we propose to make Congress give them to us; we will make our public buildings part of the bill, and we will direct who of our friends shall build them and fix what the price shall be. The House may not agree with us, but we will amend the appropriation bill the way we want it, and if we pass it through the Senate we can fix it in conferences by giving up other things, or stay all summer and coerce the House. The rules of the Senate make us quite potent men on that committee."

Hereafter under the ruling we have had this morning whenever a subject is up anything relating to that subject is in order. A hundred ships may be proposed by way of amendment, and if we can propose that, of course we can direct in the amendment who shall build them. We have seven navy-yards of our own, yet this amendment provides that the new ships shall not be built in our navy-yards. We have engineer officers living in enforced idleness; they are men of character; but we say that they shall not superintend them; they shall go into the hands of a favored contractor, and he shall charge, as is shown in the price we are required to pay for guns, 50 per cent. more than these ships can be built for if they were built honestly in the navy-yards of the country out of the free material and machinery which the United States has the right to buy in the cheapest markets in the world and import duty free.

I do not know anything about the advisory board; I never saw any of them that I know of, but I can take men like General Wright or General Meigs, men I do know, and direct them to take possession of any of our navy-yards and hire honest, competent men to build these ships, and they will build them for 50 per cent. less than Mr. Roach will undertake to build them for. The guns, as Commodore Sicard reported, that we buy in this country cost us $15,000, when they could be bought for $10,000 abroad; we pay $9,000 for what they pay $4,500 abroad. The vessels Mr. Roach builds will of course cost us 45 per cent. more, while the United States, reserving by law the right to buy everything in open market, will have to pay a price for everything that goes into the ships with the duty added; the officers of the United States are not to be trusted; contracts with private men are to be made so that they may be enriched. That is the meaning of this amendment. Of course I can not stop it. It could not be stopped, I presume, by all the votes of this side, even if all on this side agreed with me.

We are building four ships now that the officers of the Navy, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Clark, Admiral Porter, and others, criticise as not being what we need; they will be afloat before next March. If they are good ships we can build others of the same character, and if they are not we ought not to do so. We ought to wait until we see whether those ships are valuable or not. But the Presidential election is pending and other pressing matters have to be considered I presume, and the other House has to be forced to consent to make more experiments, regardless of the uncertainty about those now in process of construction.

I voted in committee for every dollar necessary to complete the cruisers that are now on hand, for their engines, their armament, for everything necessary to insure their speedy completion. We have advanced money now, not waiting until July but giving them every dollar they can use from this time forward out of the appropriations for next year, so as to enable Mr. Roach to finish them by the 1st day of next December. Let us wait and see whether they are such ships as we ought to duplicate or not. Not content with that, not content with the fact that we have passed a bill already through the Senate for more, barely recognizing the fact that the House has equal rights with us over all appropriations and over all contracts, we place the proposition in this bill again, so as to get it into the power of a conference committee, for that at last is the main reliance, so that if two men can be found in the House who will agree with two men in the Senate, notwithstanding the body of the House may non-concur with us in regard to the measure—by getting it into conference it is placed in the hands of two men, and of course they will ultimately carry it through, even if every other amendment is abandoned, and this provision will become the law, the body of the other House to the contrary notwithstanding. But it is in order, and everything I suppose will be in order from this time on.

What I ask is the great imperative necessity requiring the building of those seven vessels now without waiting to see whether the four that we are building are valuable for the purposes desired? Is war imminent? Have we not been doing without this class of ships for years? We are now making experiments with four. We do not know whether they will be good or bad. Some say they will be good, some say they will be useless.

It is said that we have an advisory board. Neither the House nor the Appropriations Committee has any confidence in the advisory board; the other House has no confidence in it. The House and the Senate committee have agreed, and I believe I agree with them, because from what I have heard I have not as much confidence in the advisory board as I had. One of the provisions inserted in this bill is that—

> The four pivot guns of the Chicago to be mounted on Clark's deflective single-gun turrets or V-shields, of the same weight as is now allowed for the mounting and armor protection of the guns.

The advisory board made a report saying that this deflective armor of Clark's can not be used, ought not to be used, and is not a fit thing to use. This is their language in regard to it:

> Second. The mounting of the four 8-inch guns of the Chicago in deflective turrets will probably make certain changes necessary in the half-turrets in which they are to be mounted, and this will affect the cost of their construction, and hence the contract.
>
> Again, the carriages for the guns have been contracted for, and in the event of the use of deflective turrets or V-shields these contracts would have to be annulled or the carriages abandoned.
>
> Third. In answering the Department's question as to whether or not it is considered expedient to place the guns in such turrets, it should be understood that the board's knowledge of the deflective turret or V-shield is derived from a drawing submitted by Mr. Clark, received 27th November, 1882. If the turret contemplated by the bill is such as represented in these drawings, they can not possibly be constructed upon the weight at present allowed for the mounting and armor protection of these guns.
> It is not deemed expedient to place the 8-inch guns of the Chicago in deflective turrets or V-shields as shown by these drawings: first, on account of their excessive weight in proportion to the protection offered; second, since the question of the advisability of having any shields for the guns of an unarmored cruiser is an open one. Among artillerists, opinions are about equally divided on the subject, and the shields already designed and contracted for are very simple and, being adjustable, can be attached or removed at pleasure.

Yet in the face of that positive report of the advisory board the House and the Senate committee have cast a vote of want of confidence in the recommendation of the advisory board, and have said: "The four pivot guns of the Chicago are to be mounted on Clark's deflective single-gun turrets or V-shields, of the same weight as is now allowed for the mounting and armor protection of the guns." Yet we are told in the face of a vote of a want of confidence by the House of Representatives and by the committee of the Senate (and I am rather inclined to think wisely, for I have rather changed my mind about them from what I have heard) that we must build seven more ships under their direction. Although we have taken the mounting of the guns of the Chicago out of their hands, and said that we have no confidence in their judgment, we have directed how these guns shall be mounted, although the board positively reported against it and say it ought not to be so done and that they have made contracts already which renders it impossible to do it. Yet after all that we are to make contracts for seven more ships under their direction and can not wait until December to see the result of their first work when there is neither war imminent nor any threat from any foreign power which looks in that direction; and if there was, the ships we are building and propose to duplicate, as I said yesterday, are not intended to enter into any combat with any foreign foe. There is not one of them that would be more than a cockle-shell in a contest with the ironclads or the great war ships either of Europe or of South America. They would not even aid in defending our coasts and seaboard cities; they would not remain near our coasts. They would be after booty in unarmed ships. They are not intended even to approach the guns of foreign vessels of war.

We propose to finish the double-turreted monitors for that purpose. We ought to buy and build big guns to place in land batteries near our harbors. We are providing torpedoes and torpedo-boats for that purpose. These things that gentlemen are now in such a hurry to multiply, which of course all the naval officers want, are merely to prey upon commerce, to be pirates upon the high seas, to hunt the merchant ships of nations that we are at war with—nations, it may be, carrying our own goods—and sink their ships with our goods on board, or escort them into some foreign port as prize for the money they can pocket safe themselves, not defending the country, interested in becoming mischief-makers for the purpose of gain. Is there any hurry in multiplying that class of ships until we can defend our coasts and cities by other means from hostile ships?

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator a question, and I ask it for information.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that he complains of these cruisers as likely to destroy American goods, because American goods are being carried in English bottoms.

Mr. BECK. I do.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator think that after we are at war with England and employing these cruisers against English commerce English bottoms will be carrying American goods?

Mr. BECK. I have only this to say in regard to that: I hope we shall not go to war——

Mr. BLAIR. But the Senator is assuming that we are at war.

Mr. BECK. I will answer the question fairly. If we do go to war we have not to-day an American ship that crosses the Atlantic Ocean from the great port of New York. Our goods will, of course, be upon the high seas, going and coming from all parts of the world, whenever war is declared, largely in English bottoms, as they are now. Do you think war will be postponed when occasion for it arises until we give a year or two notice and have our goods called in from over the world and taken from on board English ships before the war is declared?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is not answering my question. I can answer the Senator's, but I should like to have him answer my question.

Mr. BECK. I will.

Mr. BLAIR. I will state my question again. The Senator's discourse is to the effect that we should not build these cruisers, which are to chase and destroy commerce, because our commerce goes in English bottoms, and therefore if we destroy British bottoms we destroy American commerce. Now, the question I put to him is whether, assuming the war which he does assume, the American commerce will still continue to be carried in English bottoms, and if it is not, how are these cruisers to destroy American commerce?

Mr. BECK. I do not suppose that after war was declared, and it was known all over the world that we were at war with England, any of her ships would come here to take our wheat or our grain; but her ships start from San Francisco with thousands of bushels of grain and have to go around Cape Horn and make a three months' trip before they get to London. Can not a war break out in ninety days? She goes to China and Japan and she returns; that makes a three months' trip. Can not war break out in that time?

Mr. BLAIR. Suppose it does break out in that time?

Mr. BECK. Then will not our goods go to the bottom in her ships if they are sunk by our cruisers?

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will allow me, suppose war does break out in that three months' time and one of these cruisers gets after a British ship and captures that British ship loaded with American grain, does he suppose that we have lost anything in retaking our own property and capturing a British ship besides? Does he imagine we shall destroy that wheat?

Mr. BECK. I think when the British ship goes to the bottom the cargo and the ship go together, and if you capture her her cargo is as much prize as the ship.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator expect that we are to abolish the ordinary rules of civilized warfare and sink these innocent ships. The confederate cruisers did not do that. We simply take them as prizes and take them to an American port and return to the American owner the grain which he shipped in the British bottom, and we have the British bottom besides.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon. I understand the goods found on a belligerent are prize as well as the bottom. As I understand the rules of all countries the foreign bottom covers the goods, and she can be sunk or taken, and the prize applies to all.

Mr. BLAIR. Then, if we capture the foreign bottom, we get the goods and will destroy neither.

Mr. BECK. Let me go on. Why are we now to build these cruisers, I ask the Senator from New Hampshire, that are not expected to defend anything? Are they to defend our coasts? Are they to defend our cities? Are they to do anything except to be pirates upon the high seas?

Mr. BLAIR. I did not understand that it was contended by anybody that these were to defend our own commerce particularly. They could defend it against weaker vessels undoubtedly, but the Senator has been informing us all the way along that we had no commerce, and I am sure it is not worth while to defend that which we have not. Our freedom from foreign attack is based upon the fact that we have nothing to destroy, and the Senator's own theory does not hold well, because he says having nothing to destroy, we employ these same foreign bottoms to transport our commodities. The thing will not work both ways.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire knows the difference between commerce and ships to carry it in. I have always said we have an immense commerce, but we have to hire the hauling and have it done by other nations. My complaint is that our immense commerce is carried on in foreign bottoms, and that we are not now by the provisions we are seeking to make preparing ourselves to resist the enemies that we may have, whether they are French, English, German, or Brazilian, but that we are proposing to build a class of ships that are to go out upon the ocean to destroy the ships of any nation we may be at war with, and those ships may have our own goods on board, as we have no merchant vessels ourselves, and I insist that there can be no great haste in building ships of that class until we provide first to have American sailors to fight in defense of our seaboard in wholly different ships, until we provide defenses for our coasts, until we provide monitors, ironclads, torpedo-boats, and land defenses that will keep off the great ironclads of the world that these ships do not pretend to contend with, and are not expected to oppose. The pretense that we are now proposing to build a navy to fight with is the merest bald, naked pretense. These ships we are now proposing to build are not intended to fight. That is what I contend, and it is what is admitted by every one who knows anything about ships and the requirements of modern warfare. The objection that I make to this provision in this appropriation bill is that it is painfully apparent that the effort is now being made to press this through not with any legitimate purpose of defending the coast or the cities of America or of carrying on war with any foreign nation, but simply to give favored pets of the Department fine ships to go off junketing and avoid the big guns, the war vessels and iron-clad ships of the enemy, and get away from them and seek to make prize-money without danger wherever they can, whether our goods are on board or not.

If we propose to build up a navy to defend ourselves we are beginning at the wrong end. It is admitted to-day, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has said so over and over again, that 95 per cent. of the sailors now on board American ships are foreigners, and foreigners of the poorest class, foreigners unfit to be retained in the great vessels that belong to their own nationalities. We want fighting men, we want fighting ships, we want guns that will compare with other people's guns if we mean war. We do not want pleasure-boats, we do not first want commerce-destroyers, for our own commerce is all carried in foreign bottoms and may be destroyed in them whether it is on board English or French vessels if we go to war with them, as all we send across the Atlantic, at least in steamships, goes in foreign bottoms. It is all liable to be sunk.

I protest against what I think is the indecent haste in the first instance of endeavoring to have this class of ships increased before we know whether those we are now building are of any value, and in the next place we ought to begin to endeavor to establish a nursery for our own seamen. I am not going to argue how a merchant marine can best be established. I thought I would on yesterday, but I have concluded to wait until the bill of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in regard to our merchant marine comes up. I think I can show that until we do build up a merchant marine and have our own sailors we will have no nursery out of which we can rely on obtaining sailors for our Navy; and as long as we are paying $150,000,000 a year to foreign nations and are lying prostrate at their feet and enabling England to clothe and feed and keep in training 100,000 of her native-born sailors by doing our work, we are not doing much to prepare for war.

I will say to those who are so much opposed to free ships that England is the last country in the world that wants us to allow our people to have free ships. She is building nearly all the merchant ships for the world now. She is building for the French, the German, the Italian, for the Brazilian, and for the Mexican Governments and people. We have treaties with them that allow them to trade with us upon exactly the same terms that our own people can. We can charge no more tariff upon goods in their vessels, no more tonnage upon their ships, than on our own. England is building all the ships for all of them. There are just enough ships needed to do the carrying trade of the world.

Does it make any difference to her whether the French, German, the Mexican, or the Brazilian pays her for the ships she builds or whether we do so? Their money feeds just as many mouths of her operatives as our money would feed; she gets it all now. She will sell a ship for $200,000 that neither Mr. Roach nor any man in this country will sell for less than $300,000. Our ship-builders can not force foreign nations to pay them $300,000 for what they can get a duplicate of for $200,000. The trade of the world goes on in English-built ships.

We are simply prohibiting our own people from entering into competition with foreign nations in our own trade. Their money feeds just as many English operatives as our money would, and we are supporting for her 100,000 sailors to-day, when we have none ourselves, all for fear that Mr. Roach or Mr. Somebody-else will not get the job of building ships which no foreigner will give them, and our people can not give them, and compete with foreigners on the free, high seas in their cheap ships.

That is the policy we are pursuing. What I insist is that instead of squandering money on additional cruisers, the value of which we know nothing about, we should go to work and build up a merchant marine, with American captains, American officers, and American sailors; ships that can be converted into cruisers just as England contemplated and agreed that the Cunard steamers should be at her service whenever she desired. The Alaska to-day would be worth a dozen of these cruisers that are now building. She can sail four or five miles an hour faster than any one pretends that they will sail.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. BECK. I am not mistaken. I asked the question. The chairman of the committee will correct me if I am not stating it correctly. When the question was asked if they could not build these ships and put armor on them, they said the Alaska would sail away from them. If they would take a ship like the Alaska and put half a dozen 8-inch guns on her she would run down ten times as much commerce as these ships that you propose to build. She would be earning money for citizens of the United States during all the years of peace, and would be convertible at once into a great cruiser of the American Navy the moment war demands her service. She would be manned with American sailors, commanded by American captains and officers, and be ready to maintain the honor of the country, or at least prey upon the commerce of our enemies.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Alaska will sail five miles an hour faster than these vessels.

Mr. BECK. I believe she will. The Senator from Florida contradicted me in that, but every officer will tell him so.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What is her speed?

Mr. BECK. I do not know her speed, but I know that to be the fact, and all the officers of the Navy will so tell the Senator.

Mr. McPHERSON. Her speed is twenty miles an hour.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I have traveled in the Alaska and know something of her speed; I know something of the speed contended for these ships, and unless all calculation fails, and there is no certainty about any thing, these ships will be as fast as she is.

Mr. BECK. There is very little certainty about the usefulness of the ships we are now building. But one thing is perfectly certain. Notwithstanding it is assumed that we had to build them, because the country demanded them and patriotism demanded them (and nobody seemed to be more anxious to insist upon a patriotic view of it than the Senator from Florida), there is not one of the ships that are now being built or that we propose to build that will even pretend to enter into a contest to defend either the harbors or the cities of the United States or to enter into any contest with any of the great armored ships and the big guns we shall have to fight with any country or nation we went to war with.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Nobody has ever pretended that.

Mr. BECK. Then where is the patriotism, whence comes the cry that we must protect ourselves by building ships that nobody assumes are going to protect us if we get into trouble? Is it any protection to the country that we have put a few favorite pets of the Department on fine ships to get prize-money and pocket it? Are we to make it to the interest of any body of men in the American Navy to stir up strife with a foreign country by insulting somebody else and then preparing the way to capture unarmed ships, for that is about all that will come of this.

Is it not wiser, is it not better to wait until we see what becomes of those cruisers we are now building, and in the mean time exert ourselves in building up a great commercial marine that will make it unnecessary for us to pay $150,000,000 a year, as we are now paying to foreign nations, so that we may have seventy-five or one hundred thousand sailors of our own instead of only a fragment, and 95 per cent. of the fragment foreigners of the most worthless character? We have given a license to all the other nations of the world to trade with us upon the same terms that our own people can. Ought we to handicap our own people and give a monopoly to foreigners of the carrying trade of this country, and leave ourselves without a ship, without a sailor, without a gun on the great highway of the world's commerce? I do not think anybody will so contend.

I will go as far as any gentleman on this floor to do what is necessary for the national defense. I insist that we ought to go on as we now propose, and buy torpedo-boats, the best that we can find, just as we go to England and France now; and we are providing under this bill to go to Mr. Whitworth and Mr. Cammell to buy all the plant, whatever you call it, for the 8-inch gun. So I say let us go to Mr. Krupp's factory, if necessary, at Essen, and buy enough big guns to protect the harbor of New York, the harbor of Boston, the harbors of all the great cities, and build the torpedo-boats that we are now buying. We provide in this bill for buying one hundred thousand dollars' worth of Whitehead's torpedoes, with the right to manufacture. We can buy the right to make guns. Krupp has no patent on his guns. We can buy what we need and arrange to build more at home after we get a start from abroad.

If the cruisers we are now building turn out to be first-rate, why, then, build more, but do not begin at the wrong end; do not be as defenseless after you have spent this money as you were before, for that will be about the result; do not be tempted because the Secretary of the Navy has a pet contractor into whose hands he wants to get contracts at an early day or before it is even seen whether those he is building are going to be of any value——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. The Senator complains that the ships which are provided for in this amendment submitted by the Committee on Appropriations are to be useless. They are good for nothing, he says in advance, in maintaining the national honor, and asks why we proceed in this way against the light that we ought to have gained from other nations engaged in naval warfare. Now, does the Senator from Kentucky know that Great Britain, which, perhaps, is an exemplar as a naval power, one as safe to follow as any, has built in the last sixteen years one hundred and thirty-two ships of the kinds embraced in this amendment?

Mr. BECK. I know she has built many.

Mr. HALE. The numbers of ironclads, of armored ships, that any naval power builds will always be small compared with their cruising fleet, and Great Britain to-day is able to maintain herself in the ascendant as a naval power and to keep her domination over all other great powers more because she has a great cruising fleet on all the waters of the globe than from any other cause; and if war breaks out, she can annihilate the commerce of any other people because she has such a cruising fleet. We are following her example, seeking to have something like a respectable navy in this line.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, of course every great naval power that has fighting ships and big guns has cruisers as well, but I did not suppose any nation situated as we are now would fail to put itself in an attitude of protection first, instead of leaving itself defenseless, and with all its harbors exposed, to go out on the high seas and pirate for plunder and prize-money. What would England or France or any other country do if you were to do it but sail into the port of New York or some other of our great cities at once and laugh at our cruisers.

The first thing, as I understand it, in becoming a naval power—and we do not pretend, and I hope we never shall pretend, to build up such armaments as any of the continental nations or Great Britain, either in an army or a navy—is to become a great commercial nation, and our power and aim will always be, I hope, in that direction. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has introduced a bill to build up the merchant marine. I will not discuss that bill until it comes up, which I hope will be very soon; but in some way or other before we shall ever rank as a commercial power we must have ships of our own; we must have American sailors; we must carry our own commerce; we must keep at home the $150,000,000 a year we are now enriching foreign nations with; and in some form or other we must establish our greatness there. In the mean time we must go to Mr. Krupp or somebody else and buy such guns as will make it impossible for the ironclads of the world to enter our harbors; we must have our torpedo-boats; we must have our land defenses; and we must protect our seacoast. I have no apprehension about the lakes. Ships would have to traverse from Quebec to the Thousand Islands before they could get into Lake Ontario, and 100,000 men would take that part of Canada, and there would be no Welland Canal or a lock on it before they reached Lake Erie. The talk about the lakes is all stuff. Some naval officers think they have to be fortified. I care nothing for them; the men of the West will see to that; but we must defend our seacoast.

I am ready now to finish the cruisers we have on hand. Let us see if they are the best that can be had; let us make no mistake about that; and if we can, let us do more. I am willing to send out cruisers to make it dangerous for any country to go to war with us; but when it is assumed that we are going to build these for the defense of the country, to protect our harbors or the coast of the United States, I regard it as absurd.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question here?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. How long a time will be lost if this session of Congress does not appropriate for the additional cruisers provided for in this amendment?

Mr. BECK. I will say that we have given all the money necessary to finish them. It was said when the bill was passed in February the vessels would be ready by December. The Secretary says he never said so, but it was said by other officers. I believe the contract time is December.

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

Mr. BECK. When is it?

Mr. HALE. The contract time for the completion of the Dolphin is in the late fall. The others, the Secretary says, cannot be completed according to contract until February.

Mr. BECK. The contract time was stated on the floor over and over again to be December. They will be done early this winter; they can be put upon a cruise; they can be tested before this Congress adjourns. I do not mean this session.

Mr. HALE. Before the 4th of March?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is entirely and absolutely wrong. There is no foundation in the statements of the Department or of the contractors or of the advisory board for that. No test can be made of these vessels, excepting the Dolphin, the dispatch-boat, until long after the last session of this Congress is closed, and unless this session appropriates money nothing can be done for two years from now, and that time is lost.

Mr. BECK. If that time is lost, it had better be lost than to have four worthless ships that we have spent a good many millions upon, and many more equally worthless to be thrown away, as we have had to do with the ironclads that have lain on the stocks now for ten years. The same clamor was made then with the Puritan, the Miantonomoh, the Terror, and the Amphitrite; they were all pressed through, and it was claimed for a long time that they were of no value, they had to be changed, until it is very doubtful whether they are of any value now, although we propose to finish them. What we want to know is to ascertain that we are right, and in the mean time, while we are making this test of what kind of cruisers we shall have and see if these are of any value or not, let us address ourselves to obtaining guns to defend our cities and harbors, guns that will defend them. You can buy them. China bought nine hundred from Krupp; Italy buys them; Brazil buys them; Mexico is buying them. We have not the plant to make them here. Buy enough to make Boston safe, New York safe, Norfolk safe, and Pensacola safe. I have no fear of Baltimore or Philadelphia or any of those cities situated so far up rivers that no enemy will reach them. Buy enough guns to make Portland, Me., safe. Build your torpedo-boats; build your land batteries; finish and officer our monitors, and see if these cruisers we are building are worth anything. In the mean time, whatever money we have to spend in addition to that, let us address ourselves to the building of a merchant marine; let us have a school for our sailors; let us have ships which can carry our goods, $1,600,000,000 of which we have now, and 84 per cent. of which goes in foreign bottoms to and from our seaports. That is what I desire to see done, and I am bound to say that there is nothing in the past experience of the Navy Department that induces me to hurry up any doubtful proposition.

The Senator from Maine yesterday said in reply to the Senator from Missouri that nothing had been shown or could be shown against the management of the Navy Department. Why, sir, I have the reports of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and a great many others contradicting that. Here is a very able speech made in 1878 by Hon. Benjamin W. Harris, of Massachusetts, in which he said:

> Nevertheless the close of the war found us in possession of an ironclad fleet the largest and for defense the most formidable in the world, and with a seagoing navy sufficiently numerous and powerful to secure immunity from all danger of foreign war. We had conquered a peace after the most destructive war of modern times, and were in condition to maintain it. No nation in that supreme moment of our triumph and exultation had any temptation to engage in war with us.

Where is that fleet now? What has become of it? We had six hundred and fifty vessels when the war closed. Before December, 1871, we had—I made a note of it just now from a report made by the Senator from Massachusetts—only one hundred and thirty or one hundred and thirty-seven. Four hundred and odd ships were sold between 1866 and 1872, and we had to pass the law read yesterday by the Senator from Ohio in order to prevent that from going on, and after we did it they invented a new mode, as was suggested by the Senator from New Jersey—the breaking them up and selling them for old scrap.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question. He speaks of the six hundred and odd vessels we had at the end of the war. How many of that nominal number, which of course sounds large and seems to indicate a formidable navy, were vessels that had been purchased from the merchant marine, which were only useful in enforcing the blockade, which were never built for or intended for or purchased for permanent naval ships? If the Senator has not got the figures, I can tell him that out of his six hundred and odd four hundred and ninety-seven were of that fugitive, perishable, evanescent kind that in the natural course went out of existence within two or three years, and the sooner they were sold the better, and that is why they were sold.

Mr. FRYE. Those four hundred and ninety-seven were purchased at large.

Mr. HALE. Purchased at large from the merchant marine, never in any way built as naval ships, never conceived as war ships, but only purchased for transportation and for the incidents to the blockade; and now for any Senator to here reckon those vessels as a part of a permanent naval establishment seems to me is exaggerating the case.

Mr. BECK. I stated that we had six hundred and odd vessels, that four hundred and thirty-odd had disappeared, and the proceeds were expended by the Navy Department without giving any intelligent account of them. That is the fact.

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator mean by not giving any account?

Mr. BECK. I will state it in this way: The money for which they were sold was expended in addition to all appropriations made at that time.

Mr. HALE. There was not a dollar that was ever received from the sale of those perishable ships that were sold by the Navy Department in the years immediately succeeding the war which was not reported and accounted for, and every dollar of it can be found in the records of the Navy Department.

Mr. BECK. I said that they expended that money in addition to all the appropriations made by Congress.

Mr. HALE. How much does the Senator suppose that all this amounted to when they were sold?

Mr. BECK. I can tell the Senator pretty accurately, I think.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator can not tell me, I can tell him.

Mr. BECK. The Senator defended that Department very well for a good many years; not quite so successfully as he thinks he did, however. Is this true? I read now from the speech of Hon. Benjamin W. Harris, of Massachusetts, made on the 29th of May, 1878, taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a pamphlet copy of which he was kind enough to furnish me, in which he says:

> Nevertheless the close of the war found us in possession of an iron-clad fleet, the largest and for defense the most formidable in the world, and with a seagoing navy sufficiently numerous and powerful to secure immunity from all danger of foreign war. We had conquered a peace after the most destructive war of modern times, and were in condition to maintain it. No nation in that supreme moment of our triumph and exultation had any temptation to engage in war with us.

Were those evanescent, too? Were those ironclads, ships that were good for defense, of the character the Senator from Maine has spoken of?

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator know that every one of the ironclads that at that time were so formidable in contrast with the ships of other powers of the world have been maintained since? We have got them, but other nations have made such strides and have built such enormous ships that what was true at the time stated by the former Representative from Massachusetts, Mr. Harris, never has been true since. The American Navy never has been as formidable as it was at the close of the war; it soon fell.

Mr. BECK. Then the Puritan and the Terror and the Miantonomoh and the Monadnock and the Amphitrite will have to be thrown aside, too, because not one of them compares with the great ironclads other nations have, does not begin to compare with them. So we are repeating the same useless thing now in finishing those double-turreted monitors, and surely the cruisers we are seeking to put out would not stand a minute before any armored ship. Therefore we are to be as defenseless after we have done all that is proposed now, according to the Senator from Maine, as we are before we begin.

Mr. HALE. The double-turreted monitors, the Puritan, the Amphitrite, the Terror, and the Monadnock, when completed, will be armored ships, as destructive, as powerful, as efficient as any ships in the world, excepting a few, and a very few, of the larger class that have been built by Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy. They are not to be compared with the ironclads that we had at the close of the war, which were then so formidable. They are not simply double or three times but are ten times as efficient, great ships of war in conflict, as any of the monitors at that time, and when completed, as I have said, will furnish us effectual defense, so far as they go, excepting against the superior class, only a few, of the great powers of the world, and I have very great doubt whether those exaggerated ships built by the naval powers within the last few years will ever be brought to our shores.

Mr. BECK. I hope they never will.

Mr. HALE. And the Puritan and her class that we are to finish and that this bill provides for finishing, with the assent I believe of the Senator from Kentucky, will make ships that will be most efficient in harbor defense; and they are what we need as a companion measure to the cruisers we are trying to provide for.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. McPHERSON. Inasmuch as the Senator from Maine in his reply to the Senator from Kentucky has referred to one vessel of the United States Navy, to wit, the Puritan; and inasmuch further as he has stated that there was not a single vessel in all this list of six hundred and fifty ships borne on the Navy Register at the close of the war for which the proceeds had not been turned into the Treasury of the United States, I wish to ask one single question: Were the proceeds of the Puritan, notwithstanding the provision of the law read by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday, which required the proceeds of vessels sold to be turned into the Treasury, so paid in?

Mr. HALE. I did not say that the proceeds of the sales of ships made immediately succeeding the war were turned into the Treasury; I said that every dollar received from them could be accounted for, and the records of the Navy Department would show it. The statute passed that required everything in the nature of the proceeds of sales of ships and materials to be turned in was not passed until 1872, and in the intervening years between the close of the war and that time undoubtedly materials and ships were sold and the proceeds used by the Navy Department for its running expenses, but an absolute account can be stated of all that.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from Kentucky stated the fact that the proceeds of the sales of ships were used by the Navy Department in addition to the money appropriated by Congress.

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. And that was when there were laws upon the statute-book just as strong as the law of 1873 or 1874, to which the Senator refers.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no, sir.

Mr. McPHERSON. Now, the Senator from Kentucky admits that the money appropriated by Congress was a distinct and separate fund; that money received from the sale of ships and materials was also used by the Secretary of the Navy, without covering it into the Treasury, and made available for the same purposes as the distinct appropriations.

Here was the Puritan, of which the Senator has spoken, and I am glad he has brought up the question. She was a ship the most formidable in the world; a new ship, nearly completed by John Ericsson, the builder of the famous Monitor which destroyed the Merrimac. She had cost this Government $1,960,000; a new ship, never out of the harbor except when towed from the port of New York to the port of Philadelphia.

Mr. Howland, of New York, agreed to complete her in accordance with the contract and specifications for the sum of $300,000. When completed what would she have been? A vessel 60 per cent. more formidable, more able in every quality of military efficiency, more capable than the present Puritan, the miserable abortion which bears the name of the old vessel. On the order of Isaiah Hanscom, then Chief of the Bureau of Construction, acting under the authority of the then Secretary of the Navy, she was towed to the ship-yard of John Roach and ordered by telegraphic message to be broken up. John Roach broke her up. He charged this Government $6,000 for breaking her to pieces, and when he made his return to the Government he gave it four hundred and ninety tons of material less than had been put into the vessel when constructed.

Do you call that turning into the Federal Treasury the money for which vessels were sold? Without one particle of that ship remaining except the sign-board which bore her name, the Secretary commenced, under the name of repairs (the only thing which he had the authority to do under existing law), to repair what? The sign-board of the old Puritan, and to build a vessel which four boards of survey declared if completed in accordance with the contract would sink at her moorings.

The facts are that no contract was observed, no law was obeyed; the vessels which the liberality of Congress had enabled the Government to build would go down at their moorings; money was squandered right and left; vessels were turned over to favored contractors and traded away for new material; and that is the honest administration of the Government of which the honorable Senator from Maine speaks! This he calls covering money into the public Treasury.

The Senator from Kentucky is entirely right, and I will undertake to show some time before this discussion is ended; and if I had the physical health I should have undertaken to-day to have shown the people of this country the condition of affairs in regard to the administration of the Navy. When the honorable Senator from Maine and that side of the Chamber undertake now to compel the Congress of the United States, by affixing at the end of an appropriation bill an appropriation of money to allow the same condition of things to go on under this naval administration, for the influence outside then is to-day the power inside the Navy Department; when the honorable Senator from Maine undertakes to deny the statements of the Senator from Kentucky, then I wish him to answer me with regard to the Puritan, what has become of her, what has the Government received for her, a vessel that cost $1,960,000, a new ship that had never been out of port, and was deliberately broken to pieces and bartered to a favored contractor, who returned, not what the vessel was worth, but exactly what he pleased, to the Government. What the contractor was to receive was the ship itself; what the Government was to receive depended entirely upon his discretion.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this is a very old story of the Senator from New Jersey——

Mr. BECK. I have not yielded the floor, but I am willing this shall go on. I only desire to make this remark before the Senator from Maine proceeds, that that is an old story that he very defiantly brought up yesterday when he said that not a dollar had been spent except what appears in the appropriation bills, and that the charge that anything had been spent wrongfully was a slander.

Mr. HALE. I am not going to take up the time of the Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. BECK. The bravado of yesterday can not be made good.

Mr. HALE. This is only a renewal of the attempt of the Senator from New Jersey to alarm and array his side of the Chamber by reviving some of these old complaints. If there was anything under the sun that was thoroughly discussed by the Senate in the last session of the last Congress, it was the very subject-matter of these iron-turreted armored ships, their inception, the whole cause of their building, their change from wooden to armored iron ships. Every point in that matter was brought out fully in the discussion last year, and on that the Senate concluded deliberately to embark in the enterprise of finishing the monitors.

Now, let me say to the Senator from New Jersey, who has arrayed here in the most impressive manner possible by him his statement as to the Puritan, that from the time the first hammer was struck on the original keel of the Puritan not one step has been taken without the action and the advisement of naval boards constituted by the Secretary; every process of condemnation was approved; and finally out of it all the action was taken by the investigation of the Department upon the claim that there had been wrong proceedings; and on the action of those boards, as I explained in the debate in the last Congress—and which if necessary I will bring here again—every subsequent step has been taken. The Senator can not show that a particle of fraud or corruption rested at the bottom of this thing. Why it is that he insists now at this late day on reviving that old controversy that was settled at the last Congress, and on the basis of which, as the Senator from Kentucky knows, the Committee on Appropriations has put an appropriation in this bill of $2,000,000 to complete these monitors, passes my comprehension.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield just one minute?

Mr. HALE. All the time you want.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have not raised any question regarding the Puritan. The Senator from Maine raised the question, and he spoke of the Puritan as one of the vessels for which returns had been made in answer to the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HALE. I spoke of the Puritan as one of the ships we are proposing to finish. I never went into any of these old controversies. I never have brought them up. I have no objection to their being brought up. They only delay discussion on the practical ever-present question that is before the American Congress to-day, and that is, whether you will vote to rebuild the American Navy, whether you will vote supplies to maintain the national honor, whether you will here and now provide for the national defense. That is the real question. I am not going to occupy any great length of time in harrowing over these old things of the past. I do not believe that Senator can alarm that side of the Chamber by bringing these things up. It can not be done.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine was the Senator who brought those things up on yesterday, and he read with apparent satisfaction that so many dollars of the $385,000,000 the Senator from Missouri spoke of were spent for this and so much for that, and that all had been fairly accounted for, and that that was all that ever had been spent. When I alluded to the fact yesterday and said to him that he was undertaking a job that would last him several weeks if he was going to show that everything done with that money was proper, I simply brought the official record sent by the Secretary himself to show that in addition to all the expenditure of $385,000,000 since 1866 which had been made and the result no navy, and six hundred and fifty vessels of the United States owned at the close of the war with ironclads that were said to be the best in the world according to Mr. Harris, of Massachusetts, were nearly all gone, and that the money for which they were sold prior to 1872 or 1873, at least, was all expended in addition to the appropriations made by law; and the Secretary in his report of April 10, 1872, being Executive Document No. 250, Forty-second Congress, second session, said that $119,000,000 had been appropriated for the service for the year 1865–'66, much of which was not needed because the war closed before the fiscal year began and only $43,000,000 of that sum was spent. So they had a larger surplus remaining. Secretary Welles covered $7,400,000 of that into the Treasury. There was $24,000,000 besides what the ships sold for, in addition to all the appropriations made by law that fell into the hands of the Department. Vessels and materials were sold and the Navy Department gave a sort of account of them, but such an account! I have the official document in my hand. This is a fair specimen. No human being not in the secret is any wiser after reading it.

On the 2d day of May, 1872, I believe it was, this matter was up in the Senate as well as the House, and the present presiding officer enlightened this body as to what became of these ships. Among other things the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] then said:

> But we had a little investigation during that time into some of the affairs of the Navy Department respecting the sale of some of those ships that are now making such a fuss in this debate, and it did appear in that investigation (and if Senators are very curious I think I can look up the testimony and have it read) that, not to spend any time in detailing them, some very extraordinary performances in the way of advertising ships for sale, and then taking pains to have them awarded to the lowest instead of the highest bidder, took place in that Department. One of them we stopped and broke up; one or two we were unable to.

If that Senator will take the pains to look up how those ships were sold he will enlighten the Senator from Maine very much as to the mode in which our ships were disposed of. But I rather agree with the Senator from Maine. If he is content to go back over all these things, I do not object to doing it. I have the reports here showing the contracts of the 3d of March, 1877, which were repudiated afterward by Congress, all binding the Department when there was no appropriation made by law to carry them on—all repudiated over and over again. That is one reason, among other things, why I say that I will not provide for more cruisers of this class until we see that the contracts now made by the Department are faithfully executed; that the ships are of the character we have a right to expect them to be; that they will perform the service we expect from them, especially when it has been said on this floor by naval constructors and others that they are unfit for the use for which they are intended, when it has been said on this floor that other contractors did not dare to bid because they could not get the character of inspection that Mr. Roach could get, when it is admitted that they are of no value for defense and are only fit to prevent war by intimidating other nations—which is a great deal, of course; it is one of the things that ought to follow. If the vessels now being built can only come up to that, and if the Alaska outsails them five miles an hour, what good are they going to do in stopping her? Speed is one of the greatest elements required. Until we know the practical result on these points we ought not to duplicate them. I think the Senator from Florida will agree with me in that.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will say that the entire testimony given before the Naval Committee by those gentlemen who have devoted their lives to the public service, and whose opinions are worth more than my own and the Senator's, all concur that they will have the speed. I think that is the testimony of Admiral Porter and of the gentlemen of the Navy whom we examined; that there was no trouble whatever about getting the speed out of these ships; that it was the simplest question of mathematics.

Mr. BECK. I do not propose to say any more. I have expressed my views in regard to the matter. I opposed this amendment in the committee, but the majority overruled me. I have not the faith that I had a few days ago in the advisory board after I have seen and heard what I have about them. When the House of Representatives deliberately, against their report, ordered the armor of Engineer Clark to be placed on the guns of the Chicago, and when the committee of the Senate did the same thing, and I now believe they were right in doing it, though I opposed it, the House and the Senate committee have cast a vote of censure upon and not a vote of confidence in regard to that advisory board. I think that ought at least to make us wait until we see whether what they have advised is fit for use before we proceed to build any more ships under their direction.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the question at length, but it seems to me to be admitted on all hands that the present state of the Navy is such as to require some action by Congress. It is admitted on all hands that we have got nothing in the way of ships to defend this country or to prevent a war. It does not matter to me whether we build ships that will prevent war or ships that will succeed in defending us after war arises; the consequence is the same. It would be infinitely better if we had a power that would enable us to avoid war, which is a thing always to be deprecated; but as I said before, according to the testimony of Admiral Porter and the other officers of the Navy examined before the Naval Committee, in a few years under the existing authority of Congress, which my friend from Kentucky helped to give to the Secretary of the Navy, there will not be a naval ship afloat to bear the American flag.

I for one, without regard to party, am not willing to take the responsibility of putting out of commission every public ship that bears the flag of this great Republic and at the same time refuse to vote a dollar to supply its place.

I know there have been abuses in the past, and nobody regrets them more than I do; but I say that the statement of that fact is no answer to the demand now made by the country for some decided action with respect to the building up of a public force. Admiral Porter says in his testimony lying before me that in a few years, under the existing act of Congress, for which the Senator from Kentucky voted, there will not be a ship afloat; and they have gone on, as my friend from New Jersey knows, for he referred to it in the beginning of this debate, and condemned sixty or seventy ships. I deprecated that authority at the time it was given. I do not like to repeat myself on this subject, but I say that all this ought to have been considered before it was determined to blot out the existing navy. I say that the country will not be satisfied after Congress has passed a law giving this very Secretary the power to dispense with every ship that now bears your flag and leave the country absolutely without a ship of war except these three or four little vessels proposed to be brought into existence under the existing contract. I do not think that will satisfy the public mind. Whatever difference of opinion there may be with respect to the existence of a naval force, the public opinion of this country will demand a larger force than the three or four cruisers now being built under the existing contract.

I said before that it was a humiliating thing for me to hear in the Senate of the United States, and have it paraded before the great powers of the world, that there was no confidence anywhere in this Republic under which its interests could be attended to in great affairs like this. It is humiliating to me to think of it going out to Great Britain and to France and to the whole world that the American Republic is in such a condition it can not trust one of its own chosen officers, its President, to take a step in the direction of building up its public force. There is not a morning chronicle in London or in Paris but what will reflect on the sentiments that have gone out to the detriment of this country and its institutions and parade them before the public of their countries.

I say there is no question of party involved in this. I do not care who is in power, whether it be a Democrat or a Republican; there are some things essential to the public interest that must be done. That is the spirit that animates me. The Senator from Kentucky intimated that it was mock patriotism. Nothing of the kind; but a necessity which everybody admits. This measure proposes to give to the President of the United States this authority. I have nothing to do with Chandler or with Roach. I do not know them in this business and never will; but I do recognize the President of the United States as the head of this great Republic, exercising under all the responsibilities that can possibly attach to the highest position on earth the functions of a great office; and when he comes and says that the interests of this people require that something shall be done in the line of building up the Navy and protecting the interests of the country, I am not going to turn away from him because he happens to be a Republican and I a Democrat.

Next year or so, if we should have a Democratic President and a Republican Senate, they might take the ground that they would not trust him with these matters affecting the public welfare. Can you keep up a Government on that line? If officers fail to do their duty, hold them to accountability; impeach them, turn them out of office; but above all things take care of the interests of the Republic. That is the position this question is in. It is all very well to talk about guns, but I say here in a few years you will not have a ship able to protect your commerce in case of emergencies or to prevent war.

As I have said repeatedly before, I do not want to see our Navy destroyed, and I voted against the law to which I have alluded because, as I said yesterday, I was apprehensive that this contingency would arise, that after Congress had given the Secretary authority to put out of commission every existing wooden ship I did not believe when the time came the authority would be extended to replace them. Is not that exactly the position of the Senator from New Jersey to-day? This ground ought to have been surveyed with the eye of a statesman before you took the first step. You ought not to have given authority to destroy our existing Navy unless you were prepared to give authority to build something in its place.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I did not vote for that.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I did not either. The record shows that I did not. I took the ground at the time that I was willing to go slowly and to add to the Navy by degrees, but that I was not willing to give this extraordinary power the effect of which Admiral Porter testifies to here and says that in a few years there will not be a ship afloat to bear your flag.

Now, with respect to the testing of the cruisers at present being constructed that is all very well. They will not begin to replace the ships that are going out of commission. In two years from now all your best wooden ships will be gone and there is no help for it, because under this 30 per cent. clause, as the Senator from New Jersey knows, as Congress has given this authority, the country will be without the means of protecting the people. Then what are you going to do about it? Do you suppose that any party or any set of public men can stand before the country on the ground that this Government at this advanced day is not to have ships of war? Notwithstanding all that is said about our commerce (and God knows it is in a condition to merit nearly everything that has been said), the commercial marine of the United States is second to that of Great Britain to-day under all its disadvantages. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] said the other day that there is no necessity for a naval force except on account of commerce. Well, we have more commerce than France, more than Germany, more than Russia, more than any other power with the exception of Great Britain. Look at their navies. Where is the commerce of Peru, of Chili, of Brazil, of Spain, of any of the powers whose fleets are completely overshadowing those of the great Republic of North America?

Finding this great necessity, I have voted in the line of building up the Navy, and I shall continue to vote on that line. No matter what may have been the shortcomings of officials in the past, their existence will not justify me in refusing to place the country in a proper state. That is my position.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator states his position, and states it very frankly and very strongly. He has already voted, if I remember aright, in favor of a bill for the Navy, which bill passed the Senate and is pending in the other House of Congress. It is now proposed to repeat that legislation upon an appropriation bill, to the imminent peril, as the Senator knows, of other appropriations, just and needed appropriations, in this bill for other purposes. Does he propose to give his sanction to such an unwarranted and audacious attempt, when in fact the House has all the right to-day, all the power it possibly can have, to deal with this question that it will have if this amendment should be adopted? Does he propose to place the members of that House in the position of being again charged with starving this Government because they refuse to agree with the Senate in voting an increase of the Navy when the same bill is pending there and has not yet been considered by the appropriate committee there?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I am not going into matters between the two Houses. When it comes to that, the House of Representatives, if we are permitted to allude to it, has sent its legislation here time and again encumbered with provisions such as this body did not think proper. The Chair has already held that this provision is in order under the rules of this body. I am not going outside of this Chamber to take into consideration what the House will do or what it will not do. Whatever it does will be acceptable to me. I have only my duty to perform in this matter, and if this appropriation is in order under the rules of the Senate, and it tends in the direction that I said I favor, the building up a navy, I see nothing in the way of my supporting it, especially when I see that this country will be left in a state utterly defenseless.

Mr. MCPHERSON rose.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I would rather the Senator would let me get through and then he can make his speech. I only want to justify myself.

I concurred with the Senator, as he well knows, when this matter was first opened two years ago, stood by him, and refused to vote to give the power under which these results are being worked out, but I do not want to place myself in the position of refusing to give the Government money for the purpose of public defense on the sea, especially after the Executive has said that the national honor and necessity demand it, and we know from every quarter that that is the case.

You may say we are going to have no war. Possibly not, but you can not tell when war may come upon us. If, as has been said, these cruisers will have the effect of preventing war, that is a result which ought to be acceptable.

From the testimony before the Naval Committee from the officers who were there, I have not any doubt that these ships will be all that is claimed for them. As I said to the Senator from Kentucky, I did not expect them to be able to cope with the great ironclads of England and France and Italy, but still they will answer a great purpose of defense in showing to Great Britain and other maritime nations of the world—and if we have war we can only have it with them—that there is some power here to guard the public interests and to protect ourselves from their attacks. I do not think that four cruisers to take the place of our entire wooden navy will satisfy the demands of the country. What does Admiral Porter say? Let me read a question put to him by the Senator from New Jersey and his answer to it:

Senator MCPHERSON. Suppose that an appropriation of money could not be obtained sufficient to build both, which would you build?

Admiral PORTER. That is a pretty hard question to answer; we are so much in want of vessels of all kinds. In four years more almost every ship in the Navy, by the rule now adopted, will go on the retired-list. It will take more than four years to get anything like the number of ships that will be condemned by the law. Therefore I am undecided what to say about that subject.

Here is the authority of the commander-in-chief of the Navy that in four more years, under the act of Congress, for which I did not vote, but for which the Senator from Kentucky did, there will not be a ship of ours on the ocean. I say that this condition of things will not satisfy the public mind of this country in my opinion, and that neither Democrats nor Republicans, north or south, will be satisfied to see in four years every vessel that now bears the American flag retired and nothing to take its place.

It is true that our Navy never was up to the standard of European fleets and never will be; but, as I said in debate when this matter was first agitated, before the war we had a navy fit to cope with any in the world; our ships were the pride of the country; not as numerous as those of many foreign nations, but in their quality, in their build, in their naval equipment, in 1860 they were the pride of the United States. I am not going now to discuss the causes that have led to our present condition. It is enough for me to know that it exists, and I mean to put the responsibility upon those in power to put the country in something like the condition it wants to be in respect to a navy, and if they do not do their duty in this matter I mean to do mine. But I say upon the authority of Admiral Porter that in a few years the Tennessee, the Wabash, the Pensacola, all the ships you have now, will be gone, and you are going to wait to see the American flag at the head of three or four little cruisers on the ocean and our humiliation made greater even than it now is!

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 10, 1884.

The recess having expired, the House (at 11 o'clock a. m., Thursday, April 10) resumed its session.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the special order made last Monday—bills on the House Calendar for the erection of public buildings.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman give way to me, that I may present a report? It will take but a moment.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Certainly; I yield to my friend for that purpose.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. EATON. The Select Committee on the Law respecting the Election of President and Vice-President, to whom was referred the bill (S. 25) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon, have considered the same, and are of the opinion that this bill in its present form ought not to pass, but have directed me to report it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and to recommend the adoption of the substitute. I ask that the bill, with the substitute, be printed and referred to the House Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I now yield to my friend from Georgia [Mr. HARDEMAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] withdraws his motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

FREE ALCOHOL FOR PHARMACEUTICAL PURPOSES, ETC.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I hold in my hand a memorial from about two thousand citizens of the State of Georgia, residing in twenty-nine different counties, asking the repeal of the tax on alcohol used for pharmaceutical purposes, &c. I ask unanimous consent that this memorial, without the names, be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners beg to show that the tax on alcohol is a heavy burden on druggists, on physicians, and on all classes of people, more especially the poor of our country. This article enters largly into the medicines which are prime necessaries to the sick and afflicted. We show that most of the tinctures contain one-half alcohol, and many of them are all of alcohol as a menstruum. We show that the cost of the alcohol now in a pint of ordinary tincture is 15 cents, and in the stronger tinctures 30 cents; whereas without this tax the cost would be 3½ cents and 7⅛ cents respectively, thus making a great burden to the consumer. We respectfully suggest that it was not the desire or intention of Congress to put so high a tax on articles which are so indispensable, and ask that some means may be devised by which our pharmacists, our druggists, our apothecaries and our manufacturing chemists may have free alcohol for pharmaceutical purposes and for manufacturing medicines. We respectfully ask you to pass some law by which the burdensome tax above mentioned may be taken off.

PROTECTION OF MAIL MATTER FROM FIRE.

Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 226) requiring the Postmaster-General to investigate and apply the most effective means to prevent the mails on postal cars from destruction by fire; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. YOUNG, by unanimous consent, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5397) for the relief H. B. Wilson, administrator; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

JACOB AND ELIZABETH SEUER.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6527) for the relief of Jacob and Elizabeth Seuer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

IMMEDIATE TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Ways and Means the bill (H. R. 3831) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GUANO ISLANDS.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 874, being an act to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes, title 72, in relation to guano islands, and put the same on its passage. I will state that this bill was unanimously reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House. I have the report here, which gentlemen can have read if necessary.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. From what committee is this reported?

Mr. TALBOTT. From the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The bill was passed unanimously in the Senate.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is there a report in the case?

Mr. TALBOTT. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 5574, title 72, of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, further suspended, as therein set forth, for the period of five years next from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to have the report read, reserving the right to object until after I shall have heard it.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2235) to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, title 72, in relation to guano islands, submit the following report:

The law in reference to guano islands discovered and worked by American citizens, passed in 1856, and contained in title 72 of the Revised Statutes, prohibited them from selling the guano except for the use of citizens of the United States or residents thereof, thus excluding them from the general markets of the world. The section containing this prohibition, however, by its own terms suspended its operation five years from and after 1872, and the suspension was subsequently extended by the action of Congress until last March. Since that time, now nearly a year, the exclusion of this guano from the foreign market has been in force, and has operated disastrously upon all these enterprises in which American citizens and capital are engaged. At one time nine guano islands were actively worked by Americans, near $5,000,000 being invested in the business. Several islands have been abandoned. Only three companies are at present working, and their operations are carried on with diminishing vigor.

The deposits of phosphates discovered in the Carolinas and Georgia now supply the markets of the United States, and the price has been greatly reduced. The export from the deposits of South Carolina alone are said to be near a quarter of a million of tons annually. While they can export without hinderance, the Americans operating the guano islands appertaining to the United States are prohibited from selling abroad.

The justice and policy of the bill appear to be clear; there is no opposition to it known to exist in any quarter; your committee therefore recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read by its title a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TALBOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN HOMESTEAD SETTLERS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PAYSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 100) for the relief of certain pre-emption and homestead settlers in California; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask that House bill No. 27, being a bill to amend the title of an act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws referring to mineral lands (Report No. 117), which by mistake has been placed upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, be referred to the House Calendar. I move, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be placed upon the House Calendar at the place which it should have been properly placed when reported.

The SPEAKER. It would take its proper place upon the Calendar without a motion. Does the bill make an appropriation of money or property or require an appropriation?

Mr. OATES. It does not; it is merely with reference to the disposition of certain public lands in Alabama.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the House Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SALLIE A. SPENCE.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 431) for the relief of Sallie A. Spence, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to pay to Sallie A. Spence $100, for rent of a building at Murfreesborough, Tenn., used and occupied as a hospital, under contract with the proper military officers, during July, 1864.

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the right to object until I can hear a statement from the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee. This bill, Mr. Speaker, has passed the Senate, and was unanimously reported upon by the Committee on Claims. The facts of the case are simply these: That this lady was the owner of a building in Murfreesborough, Tenn., which was leased from her by the War Department, under a contract fixing the payment at the rate of $100 per month. A regular voucher was given to the claimant for a month's rent under the terms of the contract, which was presented for payment, but refused on the ground that the claim originated during the rebellion in an insurrectionary State. She only asks now that the $100 due for the time during which the building was occupied as a hospital under the contract shall be paid. The bill unanimously passed the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be again reported.

Mr. STORM. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will not object, but will allow the bill to be again reported.

Mr. STORM. I will withdraw the objection until the bill is read, reserving, however, the right to object.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I renew the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What is it?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. To go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to proceed with the further consideration of the special order, being the bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BUCKNER. Can we not antagonize that with a motion to take a vote on the bill already reported from the Committee of the Whole House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can antagonize it by voting against it.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is it not amendable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union yesterday are unfinished business of the same class.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. After the recess I now move that the House adjourn; and on that motion I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 65.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMPSON. Tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bills under the special order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 7.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I renew the point there is no quorum.

Mr. BELFORD. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I hope my friend will withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. BELFORD. If the gentleman wishes to let this filibustering go on, I do not. But I will withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. STOCKSLAGER as tellers.

CAVALRY POST, SAN ANTONIO, TEX.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Lieutenant-General of the Army containing estimates and plans, &c., for converting one-half of the quartermaster's depot at San Antonio, Tex., into a military post sufficient to garrison six companies of cavalry, and recommending an appropriation therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SUBMARINE CABLE, RHODE ISLAND.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Chief Signal Officer of the Army setting forth the necessity of a new submarine cable between Block Island, R. I., and the main-land; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the special order.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 99.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will withdraw the point of no quorum if we can have a vote on the bill already reported to the House.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I have no authority from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to do so.

The SPEAKER. The tellers report—ayes 120, noes 15.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No quorum.

Mr. BELFORD. I demand a call of the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 13.

So a call of the House was ordered.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 82.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Is it in order to move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call?

The SPEAKER. The call has not yet been proceeded with. The only mode would be to reconsider the vote ordering a call of the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I move to reconsider the vote ordering a call of the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. That is the regular order.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS] moves to reconsider the vote by which the call of the House was ordered. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] moves to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 48, noes 37.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Anderson, | Davis, G. R. | Ketcham, | Robinson, J. S. |

| Cutcheon, | Kellogg, | Robertson, | |

When the name of Mr. ERMENTROUT was reached,

Mr. STOCKSLAGER said: It is evident there is a quorum present. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the call of the roll can be interrupted.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I wish to inquire of the Chair how many members have answered?

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and twenty-five members have answered. The doors will now be closed.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call, as there is a quorum present.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 105, noes 16.

So further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is now within three minutes of the time assigned for the regular meeting of the House. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 20—not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I make the point of order that this day has ended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with that as a point of order. The legislative day will continue as long as the House sees proper to remain in session.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. STOCKSLAGER, there were ayes 117, noes 26.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No quorum.

Mr. BELFORD. I demand a call of the House.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. There is evidently a quorum present. The call of the House disclosed that fact, and I hope the gentleman from Colorado will withdraw his motion.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Colorado insist on his motion?

Mr. BELFORD. I insist on my motion that there be a call of the House to ascertain whether we have a quorum of courageous men or of cowards.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

The motion for the call of the House was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. STOCKSLAGER, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. WARNER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 142, noes 21.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I call for the yeas and nays. It will save time to give us the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 17 members voting therefor—not one-fifth of the last vote.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let us have tellers on the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will allow the House to decide whether tellers shall be ordered or not, although the gentleman from Ohio is somewhat late in making his demand.

On the question of ordering tellers, there were ayes 16—not one-fifth of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Tellers are refused, the yeas and nays are refused, and the motion is agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itsef into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with reference to the erection of public buildings, in pursuance of the resolution of the House adopted on Monday last. The committee will resume consideration of the bill which constitutes the unfinished business.

The Clerk will report the bill.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GREENVILLE, S. C.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1458) for the erection of a public building at Greenville, S. C.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise procure a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Greenville, in the State of South Carolina, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use of the United States district and circuit courts, post-office, internal-revenue office, and for other Government uses; the plans and estimates for said building to be prepared, examined, and approved as required by section 3734 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and at a cost which shall not exceed the sum of $50,000 when finally completed: Provided, That no money to be appropriated for said building shall be used until a valid title to the site selected (which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least fifty feet, including streets and alleys) shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of South Carolina shall have ceded jurisdiction over the same for all purposes, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, except for the enforcement of the criminal laws of the State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I yield twelve minutes of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS].

Mr. STORM. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is one of the beauties of the resolution under which we are acting that we can not even have the report read.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. STORM addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. STORM. I have risen for the purpose of calling for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the report, the Chair will say, is a matter of debate, and it is not in order for any gentleman to demand it as a matter of right. There is no rule of the House which requires it. It is a matter of debate, and if the report be read the time occupied in reading it must come out of the half hour allowed for debate.

Mr. STORM. What rule of the House provides that the reading of a report is not always in order?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no rule of the House that declares it to be in order to have a report read, and it has been the universal practice and usage of the House to treat the reading of a report as debate.

Mr. STORM. And is that ruling insisted upon now because of this special order?

The CHAIRMAN. Because of the special order.

Mr. STORM. I hope that those who seem to be in the majority here on this question will not object to the reading of the report.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I will state the facts contained in the report more briefly than the report does, although it is a short one.

Mr. HORR. I think it has been the practice to allow any member to call for the reading of a report.

The CHAIRMAN. It is merely a practice, as the Chair understands, in the absence of objection to allow a report to be read, and when read the time of reading not to be taken out of the time for debate. But the Chair will thank the gentleman to call attention to any rule of the House giving a member the right to demand the reading of a report.

Mr. HORR. I do not know that there is any rule in direct terms, but my memory is distinct that this question was raised in the last Congress, and it was then held that any member had the right to demand the reading of the report.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not remember a single instance when the reading of the report has been denied. I trust that in the hot haste in which we are considering these bills so important a matter will not be made the foundation for the commencement of a practice so dangerous in its nature.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. In order to save time I will send up the report and ask to have it read.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time taken up in reading the report will be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Then I hope the Clerk will read rapidly.

The Clerk read the report (made by Mr. DIBBLE), as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1458) for a public building at Greenville, S. C., having had the same under consideration, begs leave to report:

That similar bills were introduced in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses, and in both instances were reported favorably; that in the Forty-sixth Congress the bill so reported failed to reach consideration, from the crowded state of the Calendar; and in the Forty-seventh Congress a bill passed the Senate for the same purpose, and a similar bill was reported favorably by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House, but likewise failed of consideration for the reason above stated; and the present bill is identical with the one last mentioned.

The grounds in favor of this bill are briefly as follows:

The city of Greenville is the third city in population and importance in the State of South Carolina, and is rapidly increasing in both particulars, an official city census, taken in September, 1883, showing an increase of population when compared with the census of 1880 of over 37 per cent. in three years and three months. It is the largest city in the western district of South Carolina, and is in the center of said district and in easy railroad communication with every section of it, by lines converging to, and crossing each other at, that point. The United States courts, exercising district court and circuit court powers, are held there regularly, and at no other point in the western district, embracing one-half of the State. So large is the amount of business there transacted that its dispatch has required, during the last few years, an extra term of court every year, in addition to the regular terms designated by statute. The present United States district attorney, in a letter on the subject, says:

"A Government court-house is a necessity. More than two-thirds of the business of the United States in this State is done in the district court at that place" [i. e., at Greenville].

The dockets of the last term of the district court at Greenville contained four hundred and sixty-five cases for trial, and previous terms have shown even a larger number, amounting at one time to seven hundred and forty-five cases.

The United States courts are now held in the county court-house, where there are no accommodations at all suited for the United States. The district judge, upon this subject, says:

"There is next to no accommodations for our officers—marshal and his deputies, clerk and his deputies—and no provision at all for the safe, methodical, and decent care of the process and papers of the court."

The circuit judge also expresses the same opinion.

There is equal necessity for suitable accommodations for the postal business. As far back as 1879, 326,570 packages of mail matter were handled, and since that time the volume of mail matter has largely increased with the growth of the city. The post-office at present is kept in a rented building, and rents are continually advancing, increasing the expense of a suitable rented building year after year.

In view of the foregoing facts, your committee recommends that the bill do pass.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I would inquire of the Chair how much of my time there is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eight minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. The facts are so fully stated in the report which has just been read that I can not add very much to it in the short time allowed me. In addition to what is stated in the report, I will simply say in reference to the action heretofore taken in regard to this bill that there is now on the Speaker's table a bill passed by the Senate at this session in exactly the same words as the bill now under consideration; but unfortunately, under the rules of the House, it is beyond the reach of this committee at present.

Greenville, where it is proposed to erect this public building, is one of the most beautiful and thriving towns anywhere in the South.

Mr. STORM. What is the population of Greenville?

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. According to the last census, that of 1880, the population of Greenville was over 5,000. According to an official census taken in September last there were 8,355 inhabitants. As stated in the report, its progress has been marvelous, and it continues to increase in population and business. It is situated in the center of the most prosperous portion of the State of South Carolina, and, with its healthful climate and commercial advantages, is destined to become one of the chief cities of the great Piedmont belt. As evidence of the rapid growth of this part of the State, I will mention the fact that in the county of Greenville (including the two mills that are within the city limits) there are seven cotton-mills, with about 50,000 spindles and 800 looms, consuming over 20,000 bags of cotton annually. In my own county, the county of Spartanburg, adjoining Greenville, there is the same number of mills, with about 34,000 spindles and 700 looms, consuming annually over 14,000 bags of cotton. In the county of Anderson, adjoining that of Greenville, there are a number of mills, running some 15,000 spindles, with 350 looms, and consuming between six and seven thousand bags of cotton annually.

The city of Greenville is fast becoming a great manufacturing town. In addition to the cotton-mills mentioned, there are there quite a number of manufacturing enterprises, important in their character, but which I have not now time to more particularly refer to.

The United States district court, having circuit court powers, has been held at Greenville a great many years. As stated in the report which has been read, the business in that court has continued to increase with great rapidity. I have before me a certificate of the clerk of the court with reference to the amount of business transacted there. At the August term of 1880 there were 187 cases on the docket; at the August term of 1881 there were 120 cases; at the August term of 1882 there were 254 cases. At the special term which was held in February, 1883, there were 188 cases, and at the August term of 1883 there were 277 cases. In addition to the terms of the court held under the statute, embracing the months of August and September in each year, for the last two years it has been necessary to hold special terms of six weeks in February and March in order to dispose of the business of this court.

As was further stated in the report of the committee, the district attorney says that this building is an "absolute necessity." He closes the same letter referred to in the report with these words:

I hazard nothing in saying that there is no point in the Southern States where the erection of a Government building is so imperatively demanded, in view solely of the requirements of the Government service."

Hon. George S. Bryan, the district judge, who has for years been zealous in his efforts to procure better facilities for the accommodation of the court and its officers, says "there is next to no accommodation" in that respect. If I had time I could show that the accommodations are utterly inadequate. The circuit judge, assistant district attorney, the marshal, and clerk all bear testimony to the same effect.

As to the showing made in the report in reference to the amount of mail matter handled and the receipts of the post-office at Greenville, there might very properly be added one-third to each of those items, by reason of the increase of business since 1879.

Mr. Chairman, I think that in this list of bills for the erection of public buildings none of more merit than this can be presented. I trust there will be no objection to it. But for fear there may be I beg leave to reserve whatever time I may have remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it will be remembered that there are in the State of South Carolina three points at which Federal courts are held. I am glad to see that my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] honors me with his attention; and if I am not accurate in my statements I hope he will correct me. I hold in my hand a paper which, although the original has been mislaid for the moment, is, as I am assured by the gentleman from South Carolina who presented the original to the House, a certified copy. The original of this paper is signed by gentlemen of the highest character in six of the counties composing the judicial district of which Greenville is the center—the counties of Union, York, Fairfield, Edgefield, Spartanburg, and Lancaster. The signers are business men, lawyers, judges, and others; and in this paper they protest against the erection of this building at Greenville, on the ground that from the nature of things it is not the place where the Federal court will permanently be held. They represent that, in view of the growth of population and the location of railroads now being constructed, another point will be more central; that this appropriation of $50,000 for the erection of a public building at Greenville, with a view exclusively to furnishing facilities for the Federal court, will tend to defeat the public will of that portion of South Carolina in respect to the location of the Federal court; will prevent an unbiased determination as to where the permanent location shall be. With this explanation I ask that the paper, without the names, be read.

Mr. MONEY. If all these people agree upon a place, will the gentleman vote for the bill to construct a building at that place?

Mr. HOLMAN. That state of facts is not yet presented. I am content to meet the case as it comes. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

The Clerk read as follows:

The undersigned respectfully submit that the bill now before the Congress of the United States to appropriate the sum of $50,000 for the building of a United States court-house for the western district of South Carolina, at Greenville, S. C., should not pass, for the following reasons:

Because Greenville is located too far from the center of the district and is less accessible to all the counties of the district, except Anderson, Pickens, and Oconee, which are the smallest and least populous of the said counties.

Because Spartanburg, S. C., is much nearer the center of the district and has much better railroad facilities, and on this account is preferred by all the counties in interest except those above named. Greenville has but two railroads, and one of these runs through the western section of the district and accommodates only a small number of the people thereof, while Spartanburg has three railroads, which run north, south, east, and west through nearly the centers of the several sections. Besides, the Greenwood, Laurens and Spartanburg Railroad has been graded and will probably be running within this year, which will make Spartanburg more accessible than Greenville to a still larger section of the district.

Because the resources of the upper part of South Carolina are as yet but partially developed, and the center of trade and commerce not yet fixed, and a United States court-house should not be located until these things have been accomplished.

Because the present indications point to Spartanburg as the future center of trade, commerce, and railroads for the western district.

Because the court-house should be located where witnesses, jurors, attorneys, and parties can reach it by the cheapest and most convenient route, and in the shortest time. This consideration will be very important when one of the terms of the circuit court shall be held in the western district.

If it be urged that Greenville has been for a long time the place for holding the court, we answer that it was selected for that purpose at a time when that place had greatly the advantage of Spartanburg in all the facilities for holding court, except in its geographical position. This is all now changed, and Spartanburg presents her claim in the confidence that every argument which would influence an impartial mind is in her favor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Gentlemen can not fail to see, from the moderate statements of this protest of citizens of South Carolina against the location of this public building at the point named in the bill, that the question here presented is whether, as the motive now urged for this appropriation seems to be so uncertain in its character, it ought to be allowed to influence our conduct in the appropriation of this money.

Yesterday the Committee of the Whole ordered to be reported favorably to the House a bill appropriating $150,000 for the erection of a public building for the purposes of the Federal court at Keokuk, Iowa; yet gentlemen, I have no doubt, are now completely informed that the public interests require the location of the Federal court at a different point in that State, and that it is more than likely—the chances are much more than equal—that the appropriation of $150,000 for the erection of a public building at that point will have one of two effects: it will either involve ultimately a loss to the Government by reason of a change in the location of the Federal court, or else it will tend to fix permanently the Federal court at that particular point, contrary to considerations of convenience and public interest.

Mr. McCOID rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will excuse me for a moment. What I object to is the passage of bills for the erection of public buildings at these numerous points where Federal courts have been provided for, and provided for with the view of furnishing an argument in favor of locating public buildings at those points—with the view of forestalling the action of the people of those States in determining through their Representatives and Senators in Congress where the Federal courts shall permanently be held.

Mr. McCOID. What I wanted to say was that the gentleman in introducing into the discussion of the pending bill his remarks with reference to the Keokuk bill is unfair. He knows that every railroad running into the other town runs into Keokuk also; that Keokuk has railroad facilities equal to those of the other town; that the two towns are but forty miles apart; that Keokuk is an important town upon the Mississippi River, and is in the most populous county in the judicial division——

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will have to excuse me; I can not yield to him further.

Mr. McCOID. The gentleman has introduced his remarks about Keokuk into the discussion of this bill, in order, I suppose, insidiously to injure the bill which has already passed. The gentleman's course is unfair, and is perverting the facts.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman need not get into a passion. His bill has been reported favorably to the House, and he can afford to be courteous, even if his local interests are at stake. I do not think our interests in any measure ought to destroy our temper. I put the case of Keokuk for the purpose of illustration; and what I have said is more than sustained by an article read yesterday from one of the most respectable papers in the State of Iowa.

I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, as I presented the memorial which has just been read by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], I desire to state some of the facts in reference to its presentation. It was forwarded to me in the absence of my colleague [Mr. EVINS], in whose district most of the people reside who signed it, and I was asked to present it, and I did present it merely because I respect the sacred right of petition, no matter from what quarter it comes.

I say to this House now, in all candor, that memorial was gotten up in a spirit of rivalry and jealousy on the part of the town of Spartanburg, between which and Greenville, where it is proposed to locate this building, there is and has long been a fierce contest for precedence in trade and power; a spirit of rivalry and jealousy—nothing more.

The entire South Carolina delegation are in favor of this bill. Everybody in the State except those actuated by the petty jealousy just mentioned are in favor of it.

Mr. Chairman, in erecting this grand Capitol at a cost of thirteen and a half million dollars we have had some regard for the comfort of members as well as for providing a symbolical structure worthy of the dignity, wealth, and greatness of this mighty Government. Now, if it be proper to build a fit Capitol in which the Legislature of the United States shall meet, why not construct comfortable and respectable quarters for the judiciary and for the collectors of customs duties and internal revenue? Why not have decent edifices for the post-offices of the cities? There is such a thing as moral power which in governments in respect to many things is far superior to physical power. The time has passed when the Federal Government should be living from hand to mouth and holding its courts in an old barn or at the mercy of some owner of a piece of dilapidated property, or even being dependent on the States. While I do not want the United States to dominate the States, I, even as an ultra State-rights man, if you choose to call me so, do wish to see this Government have suitable quarters for its judicial officers to hold court in and where the public records may be safely preserved, and I do hope, as we have only claimed the modest sum of $50,000 for this Greenville building, that the House will agree to grant it to us.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I should like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina what is the character of the four hundred and sixty-five cases reported to be upon the docket of the court in Greenville?

Mr. TILLMAN. Most of these cases are for alleged violations of the internal-revenue laws, and that is one reason why I wish to repeal those laws.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, if this bill were here standing upon its own merits outside of any combination to put through this House a number of bills under a special order which binds and gags the House, I might vote for it. I think I should. I do not understand, however, upon what theory $150,000 is appropriated for a public building for the same purpose at Keokuk, Iowa, with a population of six or seven or eight thousand people and $100,000 at Waco for a building for the same purpose, and $50,000 in Greenville, S. C., for a building for the same purpose. I say I do not know upon what theory, unless it be on this theory: that the $150,000 and $100,000 and the $50,000 are only the beginning of expenditures that are hereafter to be made. We know that has been the course in the construction of our public buildings heretofore. The gentleman from Connecticut will bear me out in the assertion that the appropriation of $200,000 for the public building in the State was run up to over $900,000 before we got through with it. So it has been with all the public buildings. I find nothing specific as to the character of the building in this bill except that the architect shall submit a plan, but what will be the cost this House officially has no means of knowing. If you would give the architects and the engineers of the country all the money they want to expend there would be no occasion for reducing taxation.

One word further. My objection, therefore, to this bill principally is it comes here combined with others under a rule that is not only iniquitous itself, but against good public morals; and all bills, Mr. Chairman, passed under such a rule should, in my judgment, if not defeated here, be vetoed after they have passed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS].

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I would not say another word except for the fact that the memorial read by the gentleman from Indiana places me in a position where it is necessary I should say something. It has already been stated by my colleague [Mr. TILLMAN] that this memorial arises out of a contest between two rival towns. As a native and resident of Spartanburg, which my friend has so eloquently represented, I should be delighted if it were consistent with my public duties and what is best for the public service to transfer this court-house from Greenville to Spartanburg. But I stand here as the Representative of the fourth Congressional district, and not merely as the Representative of my own town and county.

Mr. STORM. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina whether the facts set forth in that petition are true or not; that is what the House wishes to know and not anything about the rivalry between these two towns.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I will answer the gentleman if he will only take his seat.

Now, the facts are these: Greenville is very near the geographical center of the district.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I still have four minutes left, and will yield two of them to the gentleman.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is only about thirty or thirty-five miles from the geographical center.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I hope this will not come out of my time.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to understand as to the extent of the resolution fixing to-day for the consideration of these public-building bills. Does it apply to Senate bills on the Speaker's table, or is it confined simply to those in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks that is a parliamentary inquiry at this time, as we are engaged in the consideration of a particular bill.

Mr. BELFORD. I understood the gentleman's time had expired.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the gentleman has two minutes more.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. As I said a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, Greenville has all of the advantages, I think, that any other point in the district has as a place for holding the courts of the United States. It has sufficient railroad facilities; one long line of railroad running north and south through the whole district, and another line running east and west through the entire district. There is no difficulty whatever on that point. Another railroad, too, is now being constructed from Greenville to Laurens, adding still further facilities.

The reasons given in the memorial I do not think should prevail against the facts stated in the report of the committee, and I have no doubt the House will agree with me.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say but a single word in order to place the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in a proper position before this House. With reference to the memorial which has been sent up by my colleague from Indiana, I will state it did not reach the committee until long after the bill had been reported to the House. This committee, therefore, has now all of the information that is to be obtained with reference to that matter.

I do not know what weight should be given to it. Opportunity has been given to gentlemen from that State to have expressed their views upon the subject, and I do not think that they are averse to the action of the committee in presenting this bill.

Mr. STORM. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Certainly.

Mr. STORM. Do you know anything to the contrary as to the facts stated in the paper which was read?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I do not, sir.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman coming from that district would not allow the question to be asked. Now, I want to know from somebody who has information upon the subject as to the facts of that memorial.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I know nothing at all with reference to it except what is set forth in the memorial itself.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. What question is it the gentleman from Pennsylvania says I would not permit to be asked?

Mr. STORM. I asked you whether you could state as to the facts contained in that memorial. When I asked the question you told me to take my seat.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I said if the gentleman would take his seat I would answer the question.

Mr. STORM. But you did not answer it.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I said that it was a local question as between the two places, that there was a contest for the building.

Mr. STORM. Now I want to know with relation to the facts set forth in that memorial.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman I think is mistaken in the character of the memorial.

Mr. STORM. What I want is the fact as to the geographical situation of the two towns. It is set forth there that one of them, where it is proposed to put this building, is not properly located.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is undoubtedly a mistake.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I would say to the gentleman that the location of this building at Greenville is approved by a very large body of the people of the State and district, and the law requires the courts to be held at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate on this has expired.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEW ALBANY, IND.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I now call up House bill 337, to provide for the construction of a public building at New Albany, Ind.

Mr. PERKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to renew the inquiry made by the gentleman from Colorado, whether, if the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds desire to do so, it will be competent for them to move to take up a bill upon the Speaker's table from the Senate under the resolution which was adopted on Monday?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that he hardly considers that a parliamentary inquiry; but as a matter of fact the Chair does not think, under the terms of the motion under which the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole this morning, it can consider any bills except those reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, because the motion limited the committee to the consideration of those bills. Besides that, the Senate bills on the Speaker's table are in the House and have not been referred to the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. The resolution adopted on Monday was that we should set apart yesterday and subsequent days for the consideration of such bills reported from the committee and also such as were upon the Speaker's table from the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that these bills upon the Speaker's table must be first considered in the House. The Chair will state, however, that a ruling on that subject would hardly be pertinent now; nor would the Chair consider himself bound by a mere statement of opinion not called for by an actual question which has arisen.

Mr. KEIFER. That had better come up in the regular way when the question shall be raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not announce that, as he intimated, in the nature of a ruling.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I now call up the bill which I have intimated, House bill 337.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise procure a suitable site for a public building, which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space not less than fifty feet, including streets and alleys, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use of the United States district and circuit courts, the internal-revenue service, and the post-office; the plans and estimates of said building having first been prepared, examined, and approved as required by section 3734 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, upon calculations and specifications that will insure the completion of the building at a cost not to exceed the sum of $100,000, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no money to be appropriated for said building shall be used until a valid title to the site selected shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Indiana shall have ceded to the United States jurisdiction over the same for all purposes, during the time the Government shall be or remain the owner thereof, except for the enforcement of the criminal laws of the State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I ask for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read in the turn of the gentleman.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 337) providing for the erection of a public building at New Albany, Ind., for the use of the Government of the United States as a court-house, post-office, and other Government uses, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

That New Albany, Ind., contains a population of over 25,000 inhabitants. The post-office at New Albany is the distributing office for about fifty other offices. The receipts of the office are now over $15,000 annually. It requires the services of seven persons to transact the business of the post-office. The territory within its delivery embraces fully 35,000 people. The Government is compelled to rent such buildings as can be obtained, without regard to their adaptability or convenience to the public, for the use of the post-office and internal-revenue office at a large annual rental.

The United States circuit and district courts are located at New Albany. Within the last twelve years a large number of cases, admiralty, bankruptcy, and other civil cases, some of them involving large amounts, have been tried in these courts. And owing to the proximity of the United States quartermaster depot buildings and grounds at Jeffersonville, Ind., over which the United States courts have exclusive jurisdiction, as well as to other and natural causes, a large number of criminal cases have also been tried in the United States courts at this place. The office of the clerk of these courts, which is located two and a half squares from the place where the courts are held, has a large file of important documents, which are altogether insecure from fire. The courts are held, by permission of Floyd County, Indiana, in the grand-jury room in the county court-house, a place wholly inadequate for the easy and convenient transaction of its business.

There has been no custom-house at New Albany for a number of years, because there is no Government building in which to transact the business. The business has been audited through the Louisville, Ky., custom-house, at great inconvenience to the mercantile interests of New Albany. One firm alone, the proprietors of the glass-works, imports annually over a thousand tons of soda-ash, emery-stone, arsenic, and felting, for use in manufacturing glass. This business, as now done, entails much trouble, annoyance, and expense upon the importers. In addition, New Albany is the largest manufacturing city in the State. Her facilities for railroad and water transportation are excellent, and then she is growing rapidly in population and wealth. A bill for the erection of a public building at New Albany was favorably reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the Forty-sixth Congress, and again in the Forty-seventh Congress, but in both instances failed of a passage because they were not reached on the Calendar.

In view of the above facts, your committee recommend the passage of the bill, limiting the cost of the building and site for the same to $100,000.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the committee, I would like to be heard for a few minutes on this bill. The report as read sets forth the facts briefly in regard to the propriety of the construction of this building at New Albany, and I shall ask permission to append to my remarks some additional statistics in regard to the manufacturing business and enterprises of that city:

STATISTICS OF NEW ALBANY.

This city is the county seat of Floyd County, Indiana. Population in 1884, estimate based on average annual increase, 22,000; estimate based on township trustees' enumeration, 25,000. Location, on Ohio River, nearly opposite Louisville, Ky., and the most important town on the north bank of the Ohio between Cincinnati and Evansville, and about midway between these two cities. Immediate railroad connections with all points of the State, with all the advantages of river transportation afforded by the Ohio and its tributaries. Direct railroad lines to Saint Louis, Chicago, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and all points North, West, East, and South.

Trade statistics.—Value of river trade, $13,500,000; railroad tonnage in 1882, 240,000 tons; coal consumed annually, 7,000,000 bushels; number of industrial establishments in the city, 139; capital invested, $7,544,490; hands employed, 4,836; wages paid annually, $2,091,744; value of annual products and sales, $26,851,257.

The most important industrial establishments are plate and window glass and bottle and fruit-jar works, rail-mills, cotton-mills, hosiery-mills, cotton-batting factory, stove-works, steam-forge works, four merchant flour-mills, three large furniture factories, four large founderies and machine-shops, two extensive bent-wood works, six large tanneries, three large cooperage works, four large breweries, two large railroad-spike works, four large planing-mills, large boot and shoe factories, two brass founderies, carriage and wagon works, and cigar and tobacco factories, and other establishments representing various industries.

Two terms of the Federal courts are annually held in this city. These courts are held in the county court-house. The United States revenue service has an important office in the city, the tobacco, cigar, beer, and wholesale and retail liquor interests paying a large revenue to the Government here. The Federal courts held in this city are pensioners for a court-room upon the bounty of the county commissioners, the Government paying no rental.

The city does a large wholesale trade in groceries, dry goods, boots and shoes, liquors, &c. There are Government offices in the city as follows: Deputy clerk of Federal courts, United States commissioners, deputy United States marshal, deputy United States internal-revenue collector and assessor, postmaster. The business of the Federal courts for this district is steadily on the increase, as well as that of the post-office. Railroads centering at New Albany: Louisville, New Albany and Chicago; Jeffersonville, Madison and Indianapolis; Ohio and Mississippi; New Albany and Saint Louis Air Line. These roads afford facilities for reaching every county in the State but three, and to these there is river navigation by the Ohio.

New Albany is the most important manufacturing city in Indiana, both in number and extent of its factories. One establishment alone in the city, the De Pauw American Plate Glass Works, annually pays the Government $25,000 as custom charges on imported raw material, soda-ash, &c. Wholesale liquor, wholesale drug, wholesale queensware, and other dealers, besides other manufactories, also pay a large revenue in customs duties. The Government pays annually a heavy rental for a building for the use of the post-office. The importance of the office in this city is annually growing, and will demand increased facilities at increased cost to the Government.

Now a word as to the question of policy of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with reference to bills reported by that committee. I ask the opportunity to speak upon that subject upon my own bill, so that no man can charge me with an attempt to affect any other bill. The policy of erecting public buildings by the Government outside of the city of Washington for the transaction of the public business of the Government is no new one. It has been in existence for nearly three-quarters of a century.

During that time nearly $80,000,000 have been expended on public buildings outside of this city. I believe about one-third of that amount has gone to three States, the States of Missouri, Ohio, and New York. My friend, Colonel YOUNG, of Tennessee, a member of this committee, has compiled a detailed statement of all these statistics, which he will submit when an opportunity is offered.

I believe that a wise economy demands that we should erect public buildings at such places as the business, the convenience, and the necessities of the Government require.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me a single question?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I have so little time that I cannot yield now. But I will answer any questions the gentleman desires to ask in his own time.

I am as much in favor of economy in the erection of public buildings, I believe, as my friend and colleague, Judge HOLMAN. I believe that a rigid economy should be exercised, and I think a reasonable sum only should be appropriated for these buildings. I do not agree with the Architect of the Treasury in the following views expressed by him in his letter submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the Senate:

It does not seem to me that the subject of the erection of public buildings should be considered solely from the standpoint as to whether it is a profitable investment of public funds, but that the question of encouragement of industry and the cultivation of architectural and mechanical art may very properly be entertained, particularly when bills are under consideration for public buildings at cities whose inhabitants have not hitherto been able to profit by the education to be derived from the erection by private parties of buildings with some pretensions to architectural beauty. In furtherance of these objects, I think it would be wise to adopt a liberal policy in making appropriations for the construction of public buildings.

Secretary Folger, in a communication transmitting this letter, says:

For my part, I recognize no rule for providing a building at any place save that of the needs of the Government at that point. In other words, the sole consideration with me is one of present and continued economy with reasonable consideration of convenience.

I heartily agree with Secretary Folger in his views upon the subject. Neither do I believe in that other theory that we should have immense structures erected throughout the country to produce on the minds of the people of the country an impression of awe as to the great strength and power of the Federal Government. I do not believe in any such doctrine. It is a fallacy, and I am sorry to hear gentlemen advocating the erection of these buildings for such reasons. Again, I believe that the money expended on the public buildings throughout this country has been to some extent extravagantly and wastefully expended. But if we refuse to make appropriations on the ground of extravagance and waste in the expenditure of the money we appropriate, I ask gentlemen of this House where will you make any appropriations? Point me to a Department in this Government where two-thirds or more than one-half at least of the members of this House do not admit there is waste and extravagance in its expenditure. And yet gentlemen do not refuse to make appropriations that are necessary and proper for that reason. Neither do I think they should do it in this instance.

I think the law governing the erection of public buildings should be amended, and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are now preparing this session to introduce a bill and endeavor to push it to its passage for the purpose of providing a better and more economical system of constructing.

So far as this bill now under consideration is concerned, I ask for $100,000. I believe it is a meritorious bill and should pass. I do not believe the amount asked is too much, although I believe it is sufficient. And yet I will say to any gentleman upon this floor, to any member of this committee, that if he thinks the bill standing alone is not meritorious or that the amount asked is too large, I shall not take it as an attack upon me, an attack upon my bill, or an attack upon the committee if he shall oppose its passage or in good faith makes a motion to reduce the amount. But I should be compelled to consider it in that light if I thought it was simply for the purpose of filibustering and wasting the time of the House, as many of the motions heretofore made in my judgment have been.

Now, one word to my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], who talks about a gag, a gag rule, and these bills being banded together and log-rolled through. I say all that is unjust, unwarranted, and uncalled for and untrue. Every gentleman of this committee knows that the gentleman from Ohio almost talked himself hoarse yesterday. He talked nearly all day yesterday and has commenced it again to-day. He has talked more than any other man on this floor; certainly much more than I have done; certainly much more than any member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Then why should he speak of being gagged?

The gentlemen from Ohio and other gentlemen on the floor have seen proper to denounce in very severe terms the method adopted by the House, by more than a two-thirds vote, for the consideration of these bills. How have these bills been passed heretofore? Four-fifths of them have passed under a suspension of the rules, and had this special order not been made these bills could only have passed this House in that way. Under that system, which is one of favoritism entirely, the same debate, and no more, is allowed that is permitted under the special order. And under a suspension of the rules no amendment can be made. Under this order unlimited amendment can be made. Now, which is the fairer and the better system? That this is no fair-minded man will gainsay. Then why all this outcry against this method of passing these bills? It is not founded on reason and is all wrong.

The gentleman from Ohio speaks of the appropriations here made as being only an entering-wedge, and that additional sums will hereafter be asked to complete the buildings. If the gentleman will listen to the reading of one of these bills, and I believe they are all alike in form, he will find the appropriations are limited absolutely to the amount specified, and can not be changed unless they are changed by the action of a future Congress. Of course we can not bind a future Congress on this or any other subject; but we go as far as we can go to limit the expenditure of that amount. That amount and no more than that, without the action of a future Congress, can be expended. The law makes it a penal offense for the officers of the Government to expend an amount beyond the appropriation. This much I have said in justice to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. TULLY. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana a question?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Certainly.

Mr. TULLY. Which is the larger city, Keokuk or New Albany?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I presume New Albany.

Mr. WILLIS. It is three times as large.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I do not know the population of Keokuk, and therefore can not answer the question of the gentleman from California accurately. The population of New Albany is about 25,000.

Mr. TULLY. Then upon what principle is there an appropriation of $150,000 for Keokuk, and only $100,000 for New Albany?

Mr. WILLIS. That is due to the modesty of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I am acquainted with all the facts.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. My friend says it is due to my modesty. I thank him for the compliment. But there are other things to be considered, as, for instance, the relative cheapness of material in different parts of the country. We have in the neighborhood of New Albany the best building-stone in the country, superior to either granite or marble, and it can be delivered at New Albany at one-fourth the price of either granite or marble. I think $100,000 will be amply sufficient. It would not be, perhaps, if we had to go one hundred miles for material, or if we were compelled to build of granite or marble. But I do not believe in building of granite or marble when you can get good stone much cheaper and as durable.

Mr. Chairman, in this connection I desire to submit to the committee, as a reason why we can build more cheaply at New Albany than at some other places, some facts and figures bearing upon the excellence and durability of Indiana building-stone, and its cost as compared with various other leading building-stone, granite, and marble.

I desire to submit the following letter from Professor Collett, State geologist in Indiana, a man who stands pre-eminently high in his profession:

STATE OF INDIANA,
DEPARTMENT OF GEOLOGY AND NATURAL HISTORY,
Indianapolis, Ind., April 4, 1884.

DEAR SIR: You will find my remarks on the Indiana oolitic limestone on pages 29 to 33, inclusive, Geological Reports, Indiana, 1881, which I send by express to you; also mechanical tests, carefully measured, pages 34 to 47, same report.

The analyses show it is of wonderful purity, 95 to 98 per cent. carbonate of lime. The impurities are organic matter (petroleum) with a minimum or freedom from corrodable minerals. Consequently it is capable of withstanding in this changeable climate the action of air, heat, and frost, and I have specimens showing the delicate hair-line striations of the glacial epoch as perfect as if made yesterday, yet exposed to the elements, according to astronomers, full five thousand years. It is in humanity's time fairly indestructible.

In the climate of the United States, with abundant moisture and quick changes of temperature, rigid granite and marble can not submit to the rapid expansion and contraction incident to quick changes. Indiana oolitic limestone, however, is elastic, will bend and stretch (see table after page 42, Indiana Geological Reports, 1881), returning to its original power and resonant as steel after being so bent one thousand times. In purity and elasticity it is unparalleled, unique. It occurs in several counties, on several lines of transportation, so favorable, competing rates are obtained, and as well competing prices.

Soft in the quarry, it is cut out of the living rock with steam channelers, cheaply, without waste; hence can be furnished at one-quarter to one-half the price of granite, marble, or the best of worthless sandstones.

Brown sandstone, such as used for "brownstone fronts" (of Connecticut), will last fourteen to twenty years; in Philadelphia such houses [Tom Scott's] come down after fifteen years, and Indiana stone takes its place.

This Indiana oolitic limestone is used also in our new State-house, United States post-office and court-room, county court-house, and in many public and private buildings, showing perfect markings, sculpture, and elastic resonance after use of fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, or thirty years. The outcrops of the valleys, old as the glacial epoch, oppose the elements with perpendicular outcrop. It will last. It bears the heaviest burdens, 10,000 to 12,000 pounds per square inch, leaving two hundred to four hundred as a factor of safety. (The heaviest burden in the dome of the new State-house is fifty-two pounds per square inch.) It is stronger than granite, marble, or sandrock. (See table, page 43, Indiana Geological Report.)

The stone is of neutral, gray tint, grateful to the eye, becomes white, by decay of petroleum, with age; does not easily stain; and brushed with a steel brush once in ten to twenty years presents a new and showy appearance.

I believe it to be the handsomest, cheapest, and best material in the world for our climate.

I have samples in my office and exposures of this stone to visit, by which all the facts here stated may be demonstrated. It is used in one of the Vanderbilt residences, New York; in Chicago city court-house; in United States buildings, Louisville; Cotton Exchange, New Orleans; May Buildings, Saint Louis; and court-houses all over the States of Indiana and Illinois.

Yours,

JOHN COLLETT, State Geologist.

Hon. S. M. STOCKSLAGER, M. C., Washington, D. C.

As to its cost as compared with other stone and with granite and marble, I desire to submit the following statement from the same gentleman:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., April 4, 1884.

DEAR FRIEND: Preparing to let the State-house contract, proposal bids were invited from quarrymen to consider in selecting material. Indiana oolitic stone was offered and furnished three times cheaper than Portsmouth (Ohio) stone; four times cheaper than Cleveland (Ohio) buff stone; five times cheaper than Maine granite, and five times cheaper than Vermont marble. That is, they demanded for their products on the yard here three, four, and five times more than did oolitic men. The cost of cutting oolitic limestone is 15 to 25 per cent. less than sandstone or granite. Oolitic limestone may be dressed and moldings made by steam planing-machine.

JOHN COLLETT.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I do not wish gentlemen to consume all my time with questions; but I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. THOMPSON. I presume that is all the use you have for your time, to give explanations.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will hear the gentleman's question and answer it if I can.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask the gentleman, as he went into the subject of the arrangements made by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds——

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I did not speak of any arrangements by the committee.

Mr. THOMPSON. My question is, how many bills the committee have agreed to call up and pass under the resolution now being executed?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will state very frankly to my friend from Kentucky exactly the facts. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have instructed me to call up the bills on the Calendar for the erection of public buildings until I shall be otherwise ordered by the committee. I am acting entirely subject to the orders of the committee, as directed by the special order.

Mr. THOMPSON. On what days of the week does the committee meet?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Its regular day of meeting is Thursday, but for two weeks past it has been meeting three or four times a week, not always, however, for the purpose of considering bills for the erection of public buildings. The committee have had much other work to do. The committee may meet at any time upon the call of the chairman.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then this is to go on until Thursday of next week?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I can not answer that. We will go on as long as the House shall desire, unless the committee shall direct otherwise. I will reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON].

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to say that by some arrangement of the chairman of the committee no man on my side of the House seems to be able to get an opportunity to be heard on any one of these bills, even to put a question to a gentleman on that side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Colorado that it has been the purpose of the Chair——

Mr. BELFORD. I do not refer to the chairman of this Committee of the Whole, but to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state in all kindness to the gentleman that the Chair has not recognized gentlemen on the left of the Chair simply because they have not asked for recognition at the time, but there is no disposition on the part of the Chair to draw any line.

Mr. BELFORD. I do not reflect upon the chairman of the Committee of the Whole at all, but I desire to say that I have on several occasions sought to obtain the floor, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] have occupied the floor about all the time.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Will the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] give me his attention for a moment? I will yield to him one-half of the time I have remaining; that is, three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] is willing to yield his time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD]——

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. One-half of the time I have remaining.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. To yield three minutes to the gentleman from Colorado. The Chair will recognize that arrangement as soon as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON], who has been previously recognized, shall have exhausted his time.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will reserve my time until the gentleman from Colorado has been heard, if he desires to ask me any questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to say that I am absolutely amazed at the conduct of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON]. During the last Congress, unless my memory is absolutely mazed and astray, that gentleman voted for an appropriation of $200,000 to build a court-house in the city of Louisville, Ky. Is that true or is it false? The gentleman also voted for an appropriation out of the public Treasury of $100,000 to build a court-house at Frankfort Ky.

Now, I desire to ask you [to Mr. THOMPSON] when did your change and conversion of heart occur? I will tell you. It was when you became one of the trinity, composed of and led by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], my old school-teacher from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], and yourself from Kentucky. Now, do you think that statesmanship consists in appropriating to your own State every dollar that you can appropriate, and then seek to deprive the other States of this Union of an equal enjoyment of the Government patronage? If I am wrong, then deny me on the floor of this House. This is the statement I make: You have appropriated $200,000 for Louisville, in your State, and $100,000 for Frankfort, in your State; and here you turn up posing as an economist and reformer. I think that is all I have to say on that subject.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BELFORD. Oh, yes; you got Paducah in, too. You have feathered your nest, and now you propose to take the feathers out of ours.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am very glad that the attack has been made upon me by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], charging me with inconsistency in opposing these bills, because it enables me to make an exhibit of my conduct and my record in that regard. Having been a member of the Forty-sixth Congress, which was Democratic, and of this House, which has a Democratic majority in it, in discharge of what I deemed a duty to my party and my country I did oppose all the public-building bills then pending. No such resolution as was log-rolled through here last Monday was ever passed through that Democratic House. There were many public-building bills pending before the Forty-sixth Congress upon the Calendar of the House, and under the rules of the House they could all be killed by a single objection.

Upon that Calendar was a bill making an appropriation for a public building at Louisville, a bill for a public building at Frankfort, one for a building at Owensborough, and one for a public building at Maysville, all in my own State, and in spite of the appeals of my colleagues, personally interested in these bills, I made the objection that killed every one of them, as well as every other public-building bill that was then upon the Calendar; for if I have been correctly informed by the Librarian, who made the examination for me, not a single public-building bill was passed by the Forty-sixth Congress after that time.

Mr. BELFORD. I am informed by a gentleman from Tennessee that over a million of dollars of appropriation was given to Kentucky.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], who is so troubled about the plethora in the public Treasury, point to any act in his own history since he has been here where he has ever sought to protect the Treasury from plunder at the hands of anybody?

Mr. BELFORD. There is no plunder in this.

Mr. THOMPSON. In every organized effort to get money out of the Treasury during this Congress my friend from Colorado has been seen and heard leading the vanguard in the attack on the Treasury.

Mr. BELFORD. I helped you whisky men of Kentucky to keep money out of the Treasury. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMPSON. If the gentleman was fairly posted on the whisky question he would understand that the whisky bill, if passed, would have increased the revenue. I think he knows less about that matter, I mean the whisky question, than he does about any thing else he deals with.

Now, as to the Forty-seventh Congress. The gentleman says that $200,000 was given to Louisville and $100,000 for a public building at Frankfort. Louisville is a city of 160,000 inhabitants. The small public building which had been in use something like forty years, and for nearly the whole of which time was the only public building in the State of Kentucky, had been outgrown entirely by the city of Louisville. There was not room any longer to transact the public business within that building, and upon presentation of the facts by the able Representative from the district, Congress did last year agree to enlarge that building.

Mr. BELFORD. Yes, and I voted for it.

Mr. THOMPSON. And you never gave a fairer or more righteous vote in your life if the facts be true as stated. I am not opposing the erection of public buildings where they are required by any public necessity; but I do oppose and will ever oppose any scheme which undertakes to force upon the House the consideration of forty-seven different public-building bills one after the other, without regard to propriety or necessity, all in a lump, making it the interest of every member who has one of these bills in charge to sustain the general scheme of public plunder in order that his particular measure may not fail. [Applause.] That is what I object to.

Mr. McCOID. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question to test his accuracy?

Mr. THOMPSON. I will answer any question. I wish we only had time to discuss these matters more fully—that the rule did not gag us, practically cut off the right of debate; for I would like for the House and the country to see in its full force the "cohesive power of public plunder" holding gentlemen together upon this floor without regard to party or section, and making them sustain a scheme of this kind because of the interest each one supposes his district has in this general raid upon the Treasury. I know it is the "pork" in the pot which makes some of you at least vote for these schemes. You can not put these bills through except by putting all your "pork" into one pot, and you all know it.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Did not the gentlemen vote to take $500,000 out of the public Treasury for the sufferers by the flood on the Ohio River?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir; I voted for it as a matter of charity. I do not live within a hundred miles of the river. And I tell you now, sir, that if this was for charity—charity to the starving, houseless, homeless poor—I would vote for it; but this is not charity, it is plunder.

Mr. BURLEIGH. It is better than charity.

Mr. McCOID. As the gentleman has said that he prevented the passage of any public-building bill in the Forty-sixth Congress, I wish to ask him whether there was not passed in that Congress a bill for the erection of a public building in the district of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD]; whether there was not passed a bill for a public building at Montgomery, in the district of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT]; whether there were not four or five public-building bills passed in that Congress, including one at Paducah, Ky.?

Mr. THOMPSON. I can only repeat, as I have already stated, that I applied to the Librarian to furnish me a list of the public-building bills passed in the Forty-sixth Congress, and he told me there was not one.

Mr. McCOID. Did not the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER] have a bill for a building at Paducah, in that State, passed in the Forty-sixth Congress?

Mr. THOMPSON. I can not remember whether it was in the Forty-sixth or the Forty-seventh. The Librarian may be mistaken; we may have passed four or five.

Mr. McCOID. It was in the Forty-sixth.

Mr. THOMPSON. It might have been that if that bill had been properly considered by the House it never would have passed, because it never was discussed in the House that I remember. If that bill was wrong, will the gentleman and the House make it a precedent to guide our actions?

Here is a list of public-building bills passed by the last Congress—a Republican Congress. The list embraces thirty-four different bills passed by a single Congress.

I wish right here to call attention to the fact that during the whole time the Democratic party was in power in the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and the Forty-sixth Congresses, all the bills that they passed for public buildings were not equal to the plundering done by the last Republican Congress. I say that we are starting out now upon the same course. If we pass the forty-seven bills now pending before the House upon this Calendar—and God knows how many more the committee is now ready to report; I sent to the clerk of the committee this morning to get the number of bills unreported, and two messengers came back with the information that he could not be found. Has he fled in order to deprive this House of the knowledge of how many more of these bills are to be foisted upon us?

Mr. BELFORD. He is a Democrat; is he not?

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not know. I presume he is. What does that signify? There seems to be no party lines here. The only difference between him and a Republican would be about that expressed by the old man down in Georgia, who one morning went up and down the street proclaiming that the Democrats had stolen half the pork he had killed and hung up the night before. Some one wanted to know how he knew they were Democrats who had stolen the pork. He said, "If they had been Republicans they would have taken it all." [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is the gentleman from Kentucky in favor of petty larceny?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am opposing the whole scheme, but if it must go through I am in favor of always making the "steal" (so called) as small as we can. Does the gentleman want to make it any larger than is necessary?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not want to make any "steal" at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. THOMPSON. Oh, yes; I wish I had an hour in which to answer you all.

Mr. YOUNG. Let me make a proposition. I feel that the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] ought to be answered. I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to continue for thirty minutes upon condition that I may be allowed a similar length of time in reply on behalf of the committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has agreed to let me ask him a question. Does he say that it is "plunder" for the United States Government to provide a proper building in which this Congress shall meet to legislate for the country? Is that "plunder?" If not, how can it be distorted into "plunder" for the Federal Government to provide decent buildings in which the business of its courts, its revenue offices, and its post-offices may be conducted, and in which the records of the Government may be preserved?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that question, because it enables me to state again that I am as much in favor of providing public buildings where there is a public necessity for them as he is. I say that each bill for a public building ought to be brought in and considered fairly upon its merits, under the rules of the House, without tying a number of bills together, as you have done here, for the purpose of log-rolling them through.

Mr. TILLMAN. One further question: Are not the members from each Congressional district the best judges as to the needs of the public service in their particular districts?

Mr. THOMPSON. No, sir; they are not. They are influenced by the passions, prejudices, and local interests of their districts and constituents; they are influenced by their own desire to secure something to which they can point as a monument of their ability, activity, energy, and popularity, indisputable evidence of what was accomplished by them during their term of service. Take only the case of this public building to be provided by the bill now pending. Do you expect this member to resist our erection of it even if unnecessary? Will we have to beg him to let us? Why, sir, human nature can not bear the strain many times repeated of securing the renomination and re-election of members to this floor if a public building gouged out of the public Treasury will secure it. [Laughter and applause.] You know we have appeal after appeal made to us on the floor of the House by members to allow them to pass their public buildings through in order that they may have something to ride back into Congress upon. There is our friend, with his head in danger, his prayers, almost tears, on the one side, and nothing on the other except patriotism and our duty to protect the public Treasury. It is hard to refuse to help them; many will not refuse. We have but little hope of securing the defeat of these bills, which are log-rolled through by combination and could not be got through in any other way.

Mr. TILLMAN. Evil to him who evil thinks.

Mr. THOMPSON. We know very well that every member of the House desires to accomplish some particular object to which he can point his constituents and upon which he can bank for his return.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Did not every single Representative from the State of Kentucky, at the time the bonded whisky bill was pending before the House, make precisely the same appeal to their personal friends to help them? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I deny it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. HALSELL. So far as I am concerned, as one of the Representatives from Kentucky, I will say that I made no such appeals.

Mr. CLAY. As one Representative from the State of Kentucky, I will say to this House, Mr. Chairman, that I made no such appeal as that stated by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HOPKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Has not the debate upon this proposition been exhausted long ago?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that it has not, but that there are still four minutes remaining.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] has asked me the question, because it enables me to answer it here and now. I did appeal on the floor of this House personally and in every other way to secure the report and passage of the bonded-whisky bill, because I knew it to be fair and just and right, and founded upon a wise statesmanship and conducive to the best interests of my constituents, as well as the best interests of the whole country. I sought in every fair way and by all proper means to secure its passage, and I believe this House made a fatal mistake, so far as that is concerned, in not passing it.

Now, I do not object, Mr. Chairman, I do not consider it improper or wrong for members of this House to make personal appeals to secure the passage of just, reasonable, and fair legislation.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Does the gentleman from Kentucky mean to say that none of these bills are fair or legitimate?

Mr. THOMPSON. No; I do not say that; and if the gentleman had listened to me in the remarks which I have just delivered he would have known very well that I did not say any such thing. But I know what is troubling my friend from Missouri [Mr. HATCH]; he is thinking of the ghost of the public building he secured at Hannibal, Mo., and, like a true man as he is, having got his pork out of the pot, as was suggested some time ago, he is resolved on seeing fair play for the balance of the boys. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that there is no ghost about the public building at Hannibal, Mo. The Government never expended $75,000 since it was established which has been worth more to it than the erection of that public building in the city of Hannibal, Mo.

Mr. THOMPSON. Every man who gets a public building thinks it is a public necessity, and it is a public necessity so far as he is concerned. [Laughter and applause.] I have no doubt of it. My friend is conscientious in what he says, and I will give him full credit for having done the best he could for Hannibal. But that is not the question we are discussing here now. We are urged here to pass these bills in the interest of each private individual, and many are not founded upon any good public policy. Instead of acting under the present gag resolution, as we are compelled to, I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, what I think we ought to do, and it would be much fairer than the present action; we ought to pass a joint resolution that every member on the floor of this House shall be allowed to have in his district at least one public building, in the language of Oakes Ames, "to put where it will do the most good." [Laughter and applause.] That would make it certain that every one would have at least one public building, and we would all be renominated and all come back. Forty-seven bills for public buildings are on the Calendar in this committee, but how many more are still to be reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds we do not know and have no means of finding out. We passed thirty-four during the last Congress.

Gentlemen, is there to be a stop anywhere to this matter? The chairman of the committee tells the House that he has the gag in our mouths and he can force the consideration of these bills so long as he wishes, until he gets through the whole of these forty-seven bills and all others to be reported.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said we could pass every one the House might think proper should be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. There remain now four minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] in favor of the bill.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I yield my time to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. YOUNG. It is impossible, Mr. Chairman, to answer the speech which has just been made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON], as it ought to be answered by some member of this committee, inside of four minutes; and I venture to ask unanimous consent of this committee to extend that time a little until I can review somewhat some of the statements which he has made.

Mr. WARREN, of Ohio. Only with the understanding that the other side may also have an equal extension of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain the request of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HARDEMAN. There are plenty of other bills on which the gentleman from Tennessee can be heard.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not care to occupy the time unless I can have an extension of it.

Mr. AIKEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know that it is exactly a parliamentary inquiry that the chairman must decide, but I know it is a question that this House would like to have answered. This, I believe, is for the erection of a public building for Indiana. Now, I desire to know if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] can not possibly find some objection to this bill. [Great laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit me to answer, I will say that so far no gentleman on the floor has found any objection to this bill.

Mr. WOLFORD. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOLFORD. The proposition made by the gentleman was just to keep gentlemen who are opposed to these public buildings from being heard. Now, I want to hear the debate on this question. So far as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] finds objection, I can answer that if we were not under the gag law there are a number of objections that might be offered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say to the gentleman from South Carolina that I consider this bill unusually meritorious, but I will join with him and vote against them all cheerfully.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to the floor.

Mr. YOUNG. I will not undertake to address the committee unless I can get unanimous consent to extend my remarks somewhat beyond the period allotted to me by the gentleman from Indiana. If there is any objection to that, I shall take some other opportunity to answer the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that in his opinion he is not permitted to submit the request to the committee for an extension of the time, for the reason that the House has imposed a limitation on the debate upon these bills, and the committee can not make any departure from that limitation without the action of the House.

Mr. YOUNG. Then I shall not occupy the time.

Mr. MONEY. I will occupy the few moments remaining if I am permitted to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi, no other gentleman claiming the floor.

Mr. MONEY. I rose, Mr. Speaker some time ago for the purpose of asking the very identical question which has been anticipated by my friend from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN]. I, too, would be glad, sir, to hear the eloquent voice of my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who never has failed heretofore to interpose his objection to any proposition, no matter what, from any quarter of this Union that did not benefit Indiana, making some objection to the pending measure. I have been very willing to accept the gentleman's leadership frequently and have approved of the gentleman's position on many occasions. I have admired the grave decorum and grace with which he has risen on this floor to protect the Treasury of the United States from raids. I have long admired his fidelity to the Treasury. But I am unable to understand why it is that he is silent on this occasion. On every other subject the House has not failed to hear his voice in opposition to any measure affecting any State except Indiana. On all such occasions no one can say that the gentleman has not been found prowling about the sacred precincts of the Treasury to protect its surplus.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is my friend asking me a question? If so I hope he will give me an opportunity of answering his question.

Mr. MONEY. I have but two or three minutes; the gentleman can find plenty of opportunity to answer on some other bill. I am sure that he will be heard on every one of the bills now pending before this committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend is certainly correct on this occasion.

Mr. MONEY. I know the gentleman is anxious to win the title of protector of the Treasury; but I know it is his desire to take care of his own people, for I remember that I caught a rap from him myself here because in discussing a matter of grave public importance I did not take care of my own people, but preferred to take care of the public interests, for which the gentleman said that I had risen to a plane of statesmanship that he could never hope to attain. But it seems to be one thing when the proposition affects any other State and quite another thing when it relates to Indiana. The gentleman exhibits a certain excess of liberality when he is giving money to Indiana, when he is to get it in his own State or for his friends; but when any other State is the beneficiary all of his great abilities are brought to the front in opposition, and the gentleman is unwilling, no matter how meritorious, to give it countenance.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, just one moment.

Mr. MONEY. No; I can not yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. Just a word in response.

Mr. MONEY. I would be glad to hear the gentleman on this or any other question, but I must decline now. I have but three minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, I trust the gentleman will not be unfair.

Mr. MONEY. If there is an appropriation for a turnpike road in Indiana the gentleman will support it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Did he not vote for the whisky bill?

Mr. MONEY. I have said that he would vote for a turnpike road in Indiana. I understand that he did that, from gentlemen around me. I have simply anticipated, it seems, what he would do.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman state what turnpike road?

Mr. MONEY. Out to some cemetery there.

Mr. HOLMAN. Ah, that is a different question. Are you opposed to the construction of roads to the national cemeteries?

Mr. MONEY. No; I am not. I should vote for appropriations for every public building, because I do not believe that the Government could make a better investment; I should vote to open up our rivers and harbors to permanent navigation, to build public buildings where they are needed. [Applause.] It is a far better investment of the money than to rent them.

You do not destroy the money; you do not throw it into the river; you put it out among your people who work for it, and you get a return in the shape of public buildings suitable for offices for the administration of the affairs of this country. And besides, wherever you place a public building that belongs to the United States it is a symbol to every man of the power of this Government and tends to attach every section of the country to a government which is represented in such a permanent and durable form as appears in its public buildings. [Applause.]

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 106, noes 25.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is that a quorum?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think there should be a quorum on the question of the laying aside of any of these bills with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio raise the point of no quorum?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being raised that a quorum has not voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 150, noes 21.

So the motion was agreed to, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMPSON. We have passed two bills to-day. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. McCOID. I rise to a question of order. I believe the gentleman from Indiana has the floor in charge of this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair of course recognizes the gentleman representing the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; but a motion that the committee rise is always in order.

The question being taken on Mr. THOMPSON's motion, there were—ayes 16, noes 82.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I now move, by instruction of the committee, to take up the bill H. R. 1339.

Mr. THOMPSON. I make the point of order that the last vote of the Committee of the Whole disclosed the lack of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is not required on the proposition that the committee rise. A motion that the committee rise is equivalent to a motion to adjourn in the House, and on a motion to adjourn a quorum is never held to be necessary. The Clerk will report the bill called up by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. THOMPSON. I believe the rule provides that whenever the committee finds itself without a quorum it shall rise and the chairman shall report the fact to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just ruled on that point.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PITTSBURGH, PA.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I call up now the bill (H. R. 1339) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Pittsburgh, Pa.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the amount heretofore fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of a public building by the United States Government at Pittsburgh, Pa., be, and the same is hereby, increased to $1,500,000, and that sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of said building.

SEC. 2. That the officers of the United States Government having charge of the erection of public buildings are authorized and required to be governed by the limitation hereby prescribed in making contracts for the erection of said building.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read. I want to see what is the necessity for this increased appropriation.

Mr. HOPKINS. Not in my time. If the gentleman wants to have the report read, the time occupied by the reading must be taken out of the time allowed in opposition.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for the reading of the report, in order that the House may act intelligently on a bill that is to appropriate $1,500,000. And I state that it has been the custom to allow the reading of reports. I hope the House will not depart from that usage in this instance.

Mr. HOPKINS. I certainly have no objection to the report being read. The only point I make is that it shall not be charged against my time.

Mr. STORM. I raise again the question that I raised before this morning, that any member has a right to have the report read unless the House decides to the contrary. I ask for the reading of the thirty-first rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the reading of a paper other than one upon which the House is called to give a final vote is demanded, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined without debate by a vote of the House.

Mr. STORM. I want to see if the committee will vote down the call for the reading of the report.

Mr. McMILLIN. There can be no vote unless there is an objection; and I should suppose that in a matter involving the appropriation of $1,500,000 there will be no objection.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. The gentleman is mistaken. The bill does not appropriate a dollar.

Mr. McMILLIN. The bill provides for a building that is to cost $1,500,000.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon again. It simply fixes the limit of the cost of a building heretofore authorized.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have never heard of an instance where the limit fixed has not been gone up to at last. This is a building that is to cost $1,500,000.

Mr. STORM. I desire to have a decision from the Chair on the question I raised.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that I am not in error as to the nature of the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to ask the Chair whether the report can not be read without being charged against the time of either side?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the view he takes as to the reading of the report. All debate on this bill having been limited by order of the House to thirty minutes, the Chair thinks the reading of the report is in the nature of debate and must be charged to the time allowed for debate. As there seems to be some doubt about the question, the Chair will direct the Clerk to read the ruling made by Mr. Speaker Stevenson on that subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Marshall called for the reading of that portion of the report of the Committee on Elections which contains a statement of the votes.

The Speaker decided that under the thirty-sixth rule, which declares that "on the previous question there shall be no debate," the reading of the report called for would not be in order, as it was in the nature of an argument which at this stage of the proceedings was forbidden.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair now states that the House having limited debate upon these bills, the reading of a report, being in the nature of debate, is not in order except it be taken out of the time for debate.

Mr. McMILLIN. With all deference to the ruling of the Chair, I wish to state that the ruling which the Chair has had read was upon a bill where the previous question had been ordered. That state of facts does not exist here. We have the simple, plain rule of the House that when the reading of a paper other than that which is to be voted upon is called for, it can not be decided by the Chair that it shall not be read, for that is not the function of the Chair. The reading comes as a matter of course, without there is an objection to it; and if there should be objection to the reading, then the question is to be decided by the House. There is no objection made to the reading of this report.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. My question of order is whether this subject is debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear gentlemen upon it. The Chair is quite willing and desirous on this question of order to hear the suggestions which gentlemen desire to submit. But the Chair would state that if there should be a disposition to protract the debate for an unreasonable length of time the Chair would interpose, but not otherwise.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have never knowingly manifested any disposition of that kind since I have been a member of the House.

What will be the effect of this ruling of the Chair? We can have none of these reports read. We want to transact business in such a way that we will at least seem to be showing some deliberation and care in the performance of our duties as legislators upon important matters. Here are bills involving an expenditure ultimately of from seven to eight millions of dollars. Is it possible that we are to have all these bills rushed through and not a single report read in any case? I can not believe that when the House a few days ago passed the resolution under which we are now acting it intended thereby any such thing.

Mr. YOUNG. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG. It is to correct a misapprehension of the gentleman. I have so often heard it stated here that the appropriations contained in these bills amount to seven or eight millions of dollars that I think it should be corrected. All the appropriations recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for this purpose amount to only $4,300,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. The bills that are embraced under the resolution now controlling the order of proceedings here, if my arithmetic is not in error, involve appropriations amounting to more than $6,000,000. But whether the amount is $6,000,000 or $4,000,000, even if it is the amount suggested by my colleague [Mr. YOUNG], is it proper that we should be called upon to vote, with only fifteen minutes allowed for debate on each side, upon bills involving an appropriation of $4,000,000 without having a single report read?

Mr. McCOID. Allow me——

Mr. McMILLIN. In a moment. To recur to the immediate question, I suggest that there has been no objection made to the reading of this report.

Mr. McCOID. It is not a question of the reading of the report. The question is out of whose time the reading shall come.

Mr McMILLIN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] suggested that it be read to come out of the time of neither side, and I think that was entirely proper and fair.

Mr. McCOID. It can be read to come out of your time.

Mr. McMILLIN. I so understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state——

Mr. STORM. There is an additional portion of the Digest which I should like to have read, beginning at the top of page 365.

The CHAIRMAN. In one moment, if the gentleman please. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] that the reason upon which the ruling of Mr. Speaker Stevenson was based was that the reading of the report was in the nature of debate. Now, the Chair holds that the pending condition of things is exactly the situation on which Mr. Speaker Stevenson based his ruling. The House has limited debate upon each one of these bills to thirty minutes. The Chair would ask the gentleman, not by way of controversy but for his own information, what rule of the House is there which gives to any member of the House the right to demand the reading of a report?

Mr. McMILLIN. Rule XXXI, which I will read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a point of order. This point of order has been made before, whether several times or once only does not make any difference; if made once, that is sufficient for the purpose I have in view. My point is that it is not in order to renew it again. I make this point of order for the purpose of saving time.

Mr. McMILLIN. I thank the gentleman for his economic disposition to save time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is entitled to a ruling on his point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. As to the gentleman's remark about my disposition to save time, let me say to him that I have a right to present to the Chair a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Georgia that he has the right to insist upon a ruling on his point of order. But there is now a point of order pending before the committee which is to be determined. The Chair will state that of course this point of order can be raised against every one of these bills.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is the very point I desired to make; I thought otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling of the Chair in one particular case does not of course preclude a ruling upon a similar case; and as on this question gentlemen are certainly very earnest in their convictions, the Chair thought it his duty, as it is his pleasure, to hear them.

Mr. BLOUNT. The rule in regard to the consideration of appropriation bills (to which I was analogizing this case) is very clear, that where a point of order has been once made and ruled upon it is not in order to make the point again.

The CHAIRMAN. This point of order has not before been made against this bill, but against another bill. The question now is simply whether the Chair should apply to this case a principle which he had applied to a prior case.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that this is not the same bill. But I was analogizing the consideration of these bills to the consideration of paragraphs in an appropriation bill. The question presented is the same and the reasons are the same.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has fallen into an error in supposing that because these bills by the action heretofore taken (by whom or how I need not say) have been locked together like the shields of a phalanx marching to the charge, therefore they are to be treated as one bill. On that point he is in error.

Now I will read the rule, the reading of which was interrupted by the gentleman from Georgia. It is Rule XXXI:

> When the reading of a paper other than one upon which the House is called to give a final vote is demanded, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined without debate by a vote of the House.

This is not a paper upon which we are to vote finally. We are to vote upon the subject-matter, but not upon the report. The objection to the reading of this paper has not been interposed, and therefore I hold that under Rule XXXI the paper may be read as a matter of course. But putting the question upon the strongest ground taken by those who object to the reading, it is clearly the duty of the Chair to submit the question of the reading to a vote.

In this connection I wish to read from the Manual a paragraph on page 365, to which my attention has been called by the gentleman in front of me [Mr. STORM]:

> There is, indeed, so manifest a propriety of permitting every member to have as much information as possible on every question on which he is to vote, that when he desires the reading, if it be seen that it is really for information and not for delay, the Speaker directs it to be read without putting a question, if no one objects; but if objected to, a question must be put.

The CHAIRMAN. While not disputing the authority which the gentleman quotes, the Chair will state that in this instance were he to direct the reading of this report or other papers he would act directly in violation of the special order of the House, which has limited the time for debate.

The Chair will state further that Rule XXXI, to which the gentleman refers, applies only to papers of which a member has the right to demand the reading. But what rule of the House gives a member the right to call for the reading of a report except as a matter of debate?

Mr. McMILLIN. I very candidly admit, Mr. Chairman, that there is no rule which in express terms gives to a member the right as a matter of course to have a report read. But so far as I have observed it has been a universal custom that the report should be read in connection with a bill to be voted upon; and this is a custom which the House ought never to depart from. The report embraces the utterances of those who have had the matter in charge, and if nothing is to be gained from having it read to the House, then the rule which requires that a bill from a committee should be accompanied with a report in writing is of no use.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to refer to a precedent bearing directly on this point. Under the former rules of this House on certain days assigned for the consideration of the Private Calendar a single objection was sufficient to carry a bill over. While that rule was in force the question arose whether during the consideration in Committee of the Whole of bills on the Private Calendar the reading of the report could be called for as a matter of course before the member was required to elect whether he would object or not. That question being presented while Mr. Blaine, a very accomplished Speaker, occupied the chair, he ruled that any member, before the question of objection was interposed, had a right to call for the reading of the report. If the reading of the report was in the nature of debate, then under the rule the objection could not be made after the report had been read, because the objection had to be made in the first instance.

Speaker Blaine held in cases where the right of a single objection existed to the further consideration of a bill that in case the reading of the report was asked for the member calling for the reading of the report had a right to have it read, and he so held for the reason that no debate had occurred up to that time. He decided it upon the ground—and I think I remember his language—that all men are amenable to reason, and that the paper which was asked to be read was a report accompanying the bill and which had been submitted to the House under its rules and by its order, and that no member should be required to vote until the reasons presented by the committee for its action had been read in the hearing of the House. He held on that occasion most distinctly that the reading of a report accompanying a bill then pending and before the House for its action was not to be considered in the nature of debate. Any clerk at the desk at all familiar with the subject will be able to find that ruling of Speaker Blaine. It was held not to be in the nature of debate, and, as the Chair will see at once, instead of being in the nature of debate these reports which accompany the bills are in the nature of a presentation of the facts in each individual case, and after the reading of the bill it would follow as a matter of course that the accompanying report should also be read as explanatory of the bill. Therefore the ruling of the Chair, in my judgment on this cursory examination of the subject, is not sustained by the ruling of Speaker Blaine, for that ruling was made upon the express ground that the member had a right to call for the reading of a report even where a single objection would prevent the passage of a bill, and that the reading of a report was not at all in the nature of debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman's argument embrace also the right to have the views of the minority read?

Mr. HOLMAN. They are not embraced because they are not a part of the report accompanying the bill; they are merely the views of the minority members.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the question whether or not the House is required to vote on the report or whether the report is in the nature of argument to sustain the bill when members are required to vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. The report may or may not be an argument. The report may not recommend the passage of the bill at all, but simply present the facts without any recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. But may not the report be an argument in support of the passage of the bill? And in that case certainly it must be considered in the nature of debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. The report accompanying a bill is a simple presentation of facts involved in the matter at issue, and as I have already stated in the case of a bill brought up on objection day when a single objection would prevent its passage, and when no debate was allowed under the rules, it was held that when a member called for the reading of the accompanying report he had the right to have it read, and that it was not to be considered in the nature of debate. I am confident if the decision of Mr. Speaker Blaine could be consulted by the chairman he would find that it is directly in point on the question now pending before the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to call the attention of my friend from Indiana to a question on that point.

The House last Monday morning suspended the rules and instructed us thereby how we should act when these bills from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds came up. One of the provisions under that resolution making these public buildings special order was that we should have thirty minutes of debate upon each proposition. Now this proposition to have the reports read is certainly debate. That resolution on Monday last on suspension of the rules suspended whatever right any member might have to test the sense of the House, whether the report accompanying a bill should be read or not. I do not wish to antagonize my friend from Indiana, for there is a good deal I admire and like in him. I have thought, perhaps, that the objector should be on our side of the House, but in this matter of point of order raised I think the gentleman is clearly wrong.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman certainly has not consulted the most recent precedent on the subject or he would hold a different opinion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am now examining this discussion on the point of order in view of the light thrown upon it by the motion to suspend the rules on Monday last.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have already called the attention of the House to a precedent directly in point where Speaker Blaine decided that the reading of the accompanying report was not to be considered in the nature of debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Hold on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let me state the point which I am trying to make to the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. But has the gentleman examined the most recent precedent on that subject, that of Speaker Blaine? Mr. Speaker Lynn Boyd was certainly a distinguished Speaker, but the precedent in the case of Mr. Speaker Blaine is much more recent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In my judgment, the Chair is clearly right; and if you wish to filibuster—and I do not take the ground we should not—why, then, filibuster in some other way than by annoying one of the best presiding officers we have had during this winter. The gentleman from Indiana says we want information. These reports of committees are sent out through the mail to us every day and we are expected to read them.

Mr. HOLMAN. But any member has the right to have them read on the floor of this House when he makes the demand, for the precedent laid down by Mr. Speaker Blaine holds that they are not to be considered in the nature of debate at all. If the gentleman from Iowa denies that such is the precedent and ruling, why then we will have the record hunted up and the decision read.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But it is clear under this proposition adopted on last Monday, to suspend the rules for the transaction of this business, that everything outside of thirty minutes' debate was entirely excluded.

Now, I did not want to mix up any other thing, but simply to protest against filibustering by any one for the purpose of perplexing such a good-natured presiding officer as the present occupant of the chair [Mr. WELLBORN].

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair is able to take care of himself.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think my friend from Tennessee and my friend from Indiana also are entirely mistaken in regard to the question of order raised here. This House on Monday last passed a new rule in regard to the consideration of a particular class of business, the class of business which is now pending before the committee. The rulings of Speaker Blaine, of Speaker Stevenson, or any other Speaker, under the general rules of the House, can by no construction be made to apply here, because the circumstances are essentially different. We have been put into a cast-iron groove, so to speak, by the adoption of the rule out of which the Chair has already decided we have no right to depart, even by unanimous consent, and the Chair would not entertain, and properly in my judgment did not entertain, the request for unanimous consent to prolonging the debate beyond a half-hour on any one of these bills; because the House on last Monday, when the rules could be suspended, decided that the debate should be restricted to one-half hour on each bill, and therefore that it was not competent for the committee even by unanimous consent to extend the time.

Now, it is evident to every member of this House, whatever may be the ruling of Speaker Blaine or anybody else, that the reading of a report of the committee is debate on any question that is pending. Everything is debate except the proposition upon which you are called directly to vote. The proposition to vote upon is the bill itself in this instance. The report of the committee is, or ought to be, a document which contains the reasons or arguments in favor of the passage or against the passage, as the case may be, if it be an adverse report of the measure. What is it, then, but debate? Nothing. Now, will the gentleman contend for a moment that he could occupy the time of the committee by the hour in reading reports if it extended the time beyond a half hour on each bill? Will he take that ground? I think not. This rule is plain. It is not subject to misconstruction. It provides that fifteen minutes shall be allowed on either side for debate, and the gentleman who controls those fifteen minutes may put into his argument anything that is pertinent to the discussion, and he may, if he desires it, incorporate the report of the committee or any other paper. But he can not extend the time beyond the fifteen minutes fixed by the House. To that it is limited. But I am surprised that gentlemen are so slow to understand the rule that ought to be so easily understood. I insist that the Chair ruled rightly, and that it should stand unless some gentleman appeals from it.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, I raised this objection, but did not raise it for the purpose of perplexing the present occupant of the chair, for I indorse heartily the compliment paid to him by the gentleman from Iowa. I raised it because when the question was up before I asked the Chair distinctly if he had ruled against my point on the ground of the special order, and I understood the Chair to say he did not but upon another ground. Therefore I renewed it because I thought that the other ruling was erroneous unless based upon the special order. But, since it has been now based upon the special order, I have nothing further to say.

The CHAIRMAN. When the question was first submitted the Chair did not base the ruling upon the special order. On a reconsideration of the question, however, the Chair finds the strongest ground upon which to rest the ruling is the special order. But the Chair still believes that it is tenable on the ground originally stated.

On both grounds, therefore, the Chair adheres to the ruling.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized in favor of the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the question of the general policy of the Government in regard to the construction of its public buildings. But I want to say a word in entering my protest against the idea that seems to be entertained by some gentlemen here, that every bill providing for the construction of a public building is a raid upon the Treasury for the benefit of some individual or of some given locality.

The Government is building its houses for the occupancy of its own officials and the transaction of its own business, and in considering such questions we are in all respects to be governed as any prudent business man would be governed in like matters, and I appeal to any business gentleman here whether in the transaction of a business involving a million of dollars he would be content to do it in a log-cabin or in a little room 10 by 12?

Now, to come to the special bill before the committee. It has been said that this is an appropriation for $1,500,000 for the construction of this building. Allow me to correct that impression in the first place. Congress passed an act appropriating $700,000 to erect a public building at Pittsburgh. Plans were submitted and approved by the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh before the work of the building commenced. But in the course of the excavation quicksands were struck, and it was not a long time before the plan of the building developed. Then it was discovered they were only building a little over one-half of the proposed building. On inquiry it was found the reason of that was the limitation. The supervising architect found he could not construct the building under the limitation fixed by the previous act. The plan had been approved by the Chamber of Commerce. I may say that for the purchase of the ground the people of Pittsburgh contributed of their own money almost $50,000 to secure an eligible site for a suitable building. When this amended plan on which they were working was developed, it was found that it cut off that much of the building, leaving it an architectural abortion, and leaving it as to space very little more than is now in the public building at Pittsburgh, and that building was erected thirty years ago. The business has so grown that three of the Federal officers have been crowded out and compelled to occupy rented houses—the pension agent, the collector of internal revenue, and the surveyor of the port.

Now, I want to call attention to some of the statistics in regard to Pittsburgh. By the same ratio that has been fixed in the buildings that have been authorized already in this and in other Congresses, Pittsburgh would have been justified in asking for an appropriation of $5,000,000, based on her population and the Federal business transacted there.

At the port of Pittsburgh the total tonnage registered is 34,803. The value of the merchandise imported for the year ending June 30, 1883 was $1,361,817. The amount of import duties paid at Pittsburgh during that year was $496,097.44. As internal revenue in the twenty-second district during the past year there was paid $1,854,674.

The building which is to be erected under this bill is for a court-house for all of Western Pennsylvania, which includes not only the twenty-second internal-revenue district, but the twenty-third, the nineteenth, the twentieth, and parts of the twelfth, thirteenth, and sixteenth. The internal revenue from the district I have thus indicated would in the aggregate be over $4,000,000.

Next in order of importance is the pension office, which is one of the seventeen pension offices in the United States. There are upon the roll payable at Pittsburgh 16,006 pensioners. The amount paid last year was $3,072,281.92.

In the post-office department the receipts during the year ending June 30, 1883, were $344,891.

Now, as to the Federal courts—and I beg to state to gentlemen that I have the official papers here from all the officers confirming every statement I make—in the district court there is an average in each term of eighty cases tried, and there are two regular terms, and often three and four special terms. There are two terms of the circuit court held there. Oftentimes both courts are in session at the same time, thus requiring two court-rooms and at least two jury-rooms, and when the grand jury is in session of course an extra jury-room.

In the circuit court the average number of cases tried for years has been three hundred and ninety-seven per year. And I may say that although Philadelphia is larger in population by two to one, and although she has a public building that cost some $7,000,000, the business of the Federal courts of Pittsburgh far exceeds that in Philadelphia, and for this reason: the western district embraces more than two-thirds of the counties of Pennsylvania. I have here a statement showing that fact, which I will not stop now to read.

In regard to the population and growth of Pittsburgh, I will state that in 1860 the population of that city was 49,000, in 1870 it was 86,000, in 1880 it was 156,000, and now it is 175,000. In 1860 Pittsburgh was the twentieth city in the United States, in 1870 the sixteenth, and in 1880 the twelfth. Pittsburgh's percentage of growth for twenty years has been larger than that of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston, Saint Louis, Baltimore, Cincinnati, or New Orleans; and it has been larger than that of any of the larger cities except Chicago, San Francisco, and Cleveland.

The population of Allegheny County is 356,000. The population of the western district of Pennsylvania, which is to be supplied by this internal-revenue office, this court-house, and this custom-house, is over 2,000,000. The population of the county alone—I call the attention of the committee to that fact—is larger than that of any one of the seven States of Vermont, New Hampshire, Delaware, Florida, Colorado, Nevada, or Oregon, and greater than the population of six of the Territories all combined.

The valuation of manufactured articles in Allegheny County per annum is $105,000,000, and exceeds in value articles manufactured in any one of twenty-seven States.

I find, Mr. Chairman, my time is rapidly running out, and I will only call attention to one or two other points. Allegheny County has recently made a contract for a court-house of her own, to cost over $2,000,000. In view of the importance of this hive of industry, which turns out a steel rail every minute of the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year and a locomotive every second day; in view of the vast amount of Federal business to be transacted; in view of the appropriations, which I say by comparison would justify a much larger claim, I think this bill should be favorably passed upon by the committee.

I submit with my remarks a letter of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suggest that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well. I will simply call attention to the fact that the Architect states that the amount specified will be required for the construction of a suitable building. And I wish also the committee to bear in mind that the $1,500,000 specified is not asked as an appropriation. Not a single dollar is asked. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The letter of the Supervising Architect referred to by Mr. HOPKINS is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
January 30, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 28th instant, asking that at my earliest convenience I give you an estimate of the probable cost of the construction at Pittsburgh, Pa., of a building suitable to the needs of the community and adapted to necessities of the public business.

In view of the information furnished me to-day as to the needs of the various public offices to be accommodated, I am satisfied the amount specified in bill H. R. 1339, increasing the limit of the cost of the building, namely, $1,500,000, will be required for the construction of a suitable building for the accommodation of all the public offices, and, judging from the proposals received for the stone-work for a portion of the building, the work can be entirely completed within that sum.

Very respectfully,

M. E. BELL, Supervising Architect.

Hon. JAMES H. HOPKINS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HOPKINS. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. There are four minutes remaining of the time for debate in advocacy of this bill.

Mr. STORM. I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] to yield me the remainder of his time.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will do so.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will give way until the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has occupied the time yielded to him.

Mr. WILLIS. I will not take it now. Let the gentleman proceed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This is a bill making an increase of appropriation for the erection of a public building. We have been told here several times that the appropriations contained in the bills before us are intended to be final appropriations, and are made as such.

The gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds [Mr. STOCKSLAGER], whose modesty has been commended on the floor for not claiming more than $100,000 for his own town, New Albany, will probably remember that in a former Congress an appropriation was made for a public building in another town in Indiana, the town of Evansville. If I recollect aright, $100,000 was the amount first appropriated. What did that building cost? Something over $300,000, I believe; and I remember that in the Forty-sixth Congress an appropriation of twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars was made for fences to be put around the building.

I hold in my hand the report of the Supervising Architect, and I will refer to a few appropriations which were first made for public buildings and then give the amount which they finally cost. The first one I come to is the public building at Albany, N. Y. I will refer only to buildings recently constructed and those under construction. Those bills contained, I presume, substantially the same limitations as are contained in the present bill.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman is entirely mistaken on that point, and that goes to the whole argument.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Very well; but let us see. The building at Albany, N. Y., was authorized by act of March 12, 1872, "which act," says the report, "limited its cost to $350,000."

Mr. WILLIS. My friend certainly does not wish to say to this House that the law under which the Albany building was constructed is the same as that under which present buildings are being constructed?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have read from the report of the Supervising Architect, which says that "the cost of the building at Albany was limited to $350,000."

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman knows, or ought to know, if he undertakes to instruct the House, that under existing law the plans are to be made and the contracts let out before the building is begun.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will make his argument in his own time. What did the building at Albany really cost? It cost $725,000. Now, take another building, the post-office at Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. In your own State.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The bill which made the first appropriation limited the cost to $1,750,000. What has it cost? It has already cost $5,400,000, and not completed yet, I believe.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him if that was not before the law prescribing a penalty in case the architect should prepare plans and make contracts in excess of the appropriation?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The architect can not tell in preparing his plans and making his estimates exactly what a building will cost.

Mr. WILLIS. He ought to be able to do so.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And he is not made a criminal for not doing that which he is not able to do.

Mr. HOPKINS. The law prescribes the penalty.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentlemen from Ohio will allow me——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] of course bears in mind that that criminal statute is only applicable where the bill which authorizes the erection of the building appropriates the entire sum of money for its cost. In every other case that law is entirely inoperative.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But let me go on. The architect can not himself contract beyond the appropriation. The first bill for the construction of a public building at Covington, Ky., limited the cost to $100,000; but it has cost $305,000. Scarcely a building has been authorized which has not cost more than the sum originally appropriated.

Mr. McCOID. What building is that in Kentucky?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The building at Covington, Ky. Take the building at Little Rock, Ark.; the first bill limited the amount to $100,000; it has already cost $251,000.

Mr. DUNN. And it is worth it, and more, too.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. These buildings must be surrounded with fences; they must be furnished.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. And they ought to be.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes. And when Congress is asked to supply furniture it will be asked to furnish it at a cost ten times what private persons would provide for themselves. These buildings are for public officials, and the theory upon which these buildings are appropriated for is that Government officials are to be aggrandized; they are to have quarters, and furniture, and everything else to compare with the buildings they occupy. Very few people can afford such or have such accommodations. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] how many officials will be accommodated in this building in Pittsburgh after it shall have been completed.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not mean how many dollars of pensions will be paid there, but how many officials will occupy this building.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will inform the gentleman as to how many officials will be accommodated. There are over one hundred employés in the post-office there; there are thirty-odd in the pension office, and I do not know how many there are in the custom-house.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The post-office employés are ordinarily in one room.

Mr. HOPKINS. By no means; they require several rooms and very large ones.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But they occupy but a small part of the whole building.

Mr. HOPKINS. They occupy the entire ground floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The truth is we are constructing buildings and furnishing offices at a rate of expenditure of from ten thousand to fifty thousand dollars for each Government official.

Mr. PAYNE. The post-office building at Pittsburgh is now a very large one, and it fails wholly to accommodate the post-office department. The internal-revenue offices occupy a building outside at a rent exceeding the interest on the full amount of the cost of this building. The pension office has to rent another building at the expense of the Government.

One word more. My friend is altogether in error in objecting to this and other bills now reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds because of the fact that certain buildings heretofore erected by the Government have exceeded in cost the amount of the limitation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman should state that in his own time.

Mr. BAYNE. Since the act of the Forty-seventh Congress the Supervising Architect has kept strictly within the limit of the appropriation allowed by law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Of what materials are these buildings to be constructed, and where are the materials to be obtained? Are you going to Vermont for marble or to Quincy for granite? Is there any assurance that the architect—and it seems to be pretty much all left to him—will not repeat the experiment tried in the erection of public buildings at Chicago and Cincinnati? For the Chicago building the stone was transported from the Ohio River, through Cincinnati to Chicago, for the erection of the Government building there; and when the public building was to be erected in Cincinnati the stone was brought through Chicago to Cincinnati; so that there was transportation of the stone from Cincinnati to Chicago for the Chicago building and from or through Chicago to Cincinnati for the Cincinnati building. This is the sort of economy the General Government practices in erecting public buildings. And I do not believe there is a public building erected by the Government anywhere in this country that could not be duplicated to-day for one-third or one-half what it has cost the Government to build it. The United States Government erects no buildings at a less cost than two or three times what it would cost the localities to construct the same buildings. Until we can change our whole system, until we can come down to the level of something like respectable economy in the construction of public buildings, I am opposed——

Mr. MILLIKEN. When the gentleman makes his statement as to the comparative cost of buildings put up by the General Government and those erected by the States, does he base his conclusion upon any facts——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Or is it simply a general statement? Has the gentleman compared the buildings of the United States Government with those erected by the States; for instance, the new State-house at Albany, N. Y.?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Albany, I am afraid, is a good deal like Washington. But take buildings anywhere. Take the building at New Haven, Conn. I am informed that contractors would agree to duplicate that building for one-third what the Government has paid for its erection.

But how many buildings are we to put up? What is the theory on which they are to be located? Is it population that should entitle a town to a Government building? There are fifty or sixty towns in Ohio having a population as large as some of the towns for which we have already appropriated money to construct public buildings. There are thirty or forty towns in Indiana, I presume, with a population equal to those for which public buildings have already been provided. Are we to go on and erect public buildings in all of these towns? Are we to log-roll them through Congress by the argument, "Put a building here for me, and I will help put one there for you." Then where is to be the end?

Mr. HOPKINS rose.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I can not give the gentleman any more of my time.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman has no right to make his insinuation about "log-rolling."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I said that might be done, and I do not think it a violent assumption.

Mr. Chairman, the theory has been advanced here that we ought to erect public buildings all over the country in this way in all these towns, as "symbols of power," palatial structures as "symbols of power." No longer a government of the people then, but one needing "symbols of power," to remind us, I suppose, that we have masters, and that these buildings are where our masters dwell! Then after you have got your great buildings, what is it going to cost to take care of them? They must be heated and lighted and cared for. How much will be added to the expenditures of the Government? Let me remind gentlemen that already in this Republic of ours—founded as a model republic by our fathers—government is costing relatively more than any government in the world. And the cost is all the time increasing, and increasing, too, faster than population increases.

A MEMBER. And it is better government.

Mr. BAYNE. It is worth all it costs.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Governments are not better by being costly. Ah, sir, it was not when Rome—— [Laughter]. Gentlemen may laugh, but examples are sometimes worth heeding.

A MEMBER. Give us modern history.

Another MEMBER. Stick to Pittsburgh.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It was not when Rome drained her provinces to support extravagance at home that the government was best. And, sir, as a rule testified to by all history, the best governments have been those that have cost least. Bad government is always costly, good government is always economical, say what you will. We have the power of taxation, it is true, and its machinery is terribly perfect, and just here let me give some figures to show what this Government costs as compared with other governments. In France, with a standing army of more than 500,000 men, the total expenditures, including interest on her vast public debt, were in 1883 a little over $350,000,000. In the German Empire, they were a little over $150,000,000; but of course that did not include the local governments of the several states comprising the empire, and Germany has an army of 400,000 men to maintain. But in France the cost of the local government is largely included in this statement of expenditure. In Great Britain the expenditures are $435,000,000; but this includes $150,000,000 interest on her public debt and nearly as much more for her army and navy. How do these figures compare with the expenses of our own Government? Last year we collected over $400,000,000 of revenue, and expended nearly $300,000,000.

So the truth is, unwelcome as it may be, that royalty, with crowns and thrones, great standing armies and vast naval armaments, is not costing as much to the people of other countries as republican government is costing in the United States under the policy that we have been pursuing since the war. And the policy of constructing public buildings all over the country as "emblems of power"—"emblems of the power" of a great government—will not lessen the burdens of government, we may be sure. I for one do not want any such "emblems of power." The emblems of power and the evidences of prosperity which I desire to see are improved homes for the people, the multiplication of comfortable dwellings for the people—not great, costly structures for a few Government officials.

Mr. HOPKINS. I admire the speech of the gentleman so much that I would like to know whether he is for or against this bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will tell the gentleman. If he will take his bill out from the operations of this order and bring it here by itself, with an appropriation for a reasonable sum—I think the appropriation proposed here is unreasonable—I will vote for it.

Mr. HOPKINS. It stands by itself now——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. So long as these bills are linked together under this order I condemn them all; I can not support any of them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WILLIS. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the amounts heretofore fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of public buildings at Pittsburgh, Pa., and Louisville, Ky., be, and the same are hereby, increased to $1,500,000, and that sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of each of said buildings.

"SEC. 2. That the officers of the United States Government having charge of the erection of public buildings are authorized and required to be governed by the limitation hereby prescribed in making contracts for the erection of said buildings."

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill applies to a public building in the State of Pennsylvania. The amendment proposes to strike that out and to substitute therefor a bill covering a public building in Kentucky as well as one in Pennsylvania.

I think, sir, that there are three grounds of objection, on each of which this proposition is subject to the point of order, one of them being a matter of fact and the others arising under the rule. The first point to which I shall call attention is that you can not amend a bill embracing a single subject of appropriations by the addition of another bill or several bills of similar character, on the principle of general parliamentary law forming the basis of our rules; and for the reason that the members of the House are entitled to vote on each individual proposition. Therefore, as I understand the rule, you can not in a matter of public expenditure involving one item embrace, as is proposed here, other matters of expenditure embracing another or many items; because if you can add one public building to the pending bill you can add all the others, and of course there will be no limit.

The second objection is that there is a bill already pending in the House and never yet acted upon, as I understand it, by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for the construction of, or the enlargement of, the limits of a public building in Louisville, Ky. However disguised by the form of the bill, the fact still remains and comes to the knowledge of the Chair and is brought to his knowledge by an inspection of the bill itself that a bill of similar substance is sought to be ingrafted upon this bill as an amendment. The Chair will perceive the change in phraseology does not change the substance of the bill pending before the House, and which is sought to be ingrafted as an amendment.

The third objection rests upon a matter of fact; that is to say, that bills to be brought before the House and considered during the execution of this special order are bills which are to be brought in upon reports from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Now, in the present instance I ask if there is a report upon this bill which is sought to be ingrafted as an amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. They have reported upon this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair has held that the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds might call up by this special rule bills in their order as determined on by the committee of which he is chairman. The Chair will see at once that that order of business is entirely defeated if every single bill pending here or every bill reported by the committee can be attached to the pending bill as an amendment. I understood the ruling of the Chair to be that the chairman of the committee was authorized under the special rule to call up bills in the order determined upon by the committee. While of course, if this amendment is admitted, this would be an entire contravention of that view of the Chair, if I understand it, it would allow these bills to be brought in all together, or in any order in which the amendment might choose to embody them.

But I base the point of order upon the two propositions, largely upon the second one, and I ask particular attention of the Chair to the subject and request that the Clerk be authorized to procure the bill and call the attention of the Chair to it. I refer to the bill providing for an increase of the building at Louisville, Ky. I will ask first if that bill has been reported to the House?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I can state to the gentleman, my colleague——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to submit the question to the Chair. I recognize the fact that time is precious.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state on one of these points of order, the last point raised, that it would be fatal to the amendment if the fact be as stated. Hence the Chair calls upon the gentleman from Kentucky for information as to the fact stated by the gentleman from Indiana. If it be true as a matter of fact that the proposed amendment seeks to incorporate into this bill matter specifically and substantially embraced in another bill pending before the House, the Chair feels compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. WILLIS. I offer the amendment as a substitute for the pending bill, not as an amendment. I understand that it has always been held that a substitute was in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. A substitute is simply an amendment to the bill, but in another form.

Mr. HOLMAN. That does not change the effect. The fact that the bill is pending must be taken official notice of by the Chair when it is called to his attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from Kentucky upon the point of order if he desires to be heard.

Mr. WILLIS. The proposition which I have offered, I repeat, is not an amendment to the bill that is pending in the committee. It is offered as a substitute, simply including another city and another amount for the same purpose as that already embodied in the bill. That has been always held as not in contravention of the rule prohibiting the embracing within a pending measure of an amendment embodying the substance of another bill pending before the House. I understand the ruling of the Chair has been for years, indeed ever since the adoption of the rules, that the substance of a bill might be embodied in the nature of a substitute to a pending bill, and that if it be offered as a substitute for the measure it may be admitted, and does not come within that strict construction of the rule which would otherwise exclude it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman answer another question? What becomes of the provision of the rule which limits debate to one-half hour on each of these bills? The meaning of that was of course one-half hour debate upon each proposed public building.

Mr. WILLIS. In answer to that I can only say that the gentleman himself has been fruitful of amendments in the committee. He has been offering them at the rate of ten a second up to this time, and on each one he has delighted the House with his eloquent words. It would therefore stand hardly in reason for the gentleman to complain of any one else, or to endeavor to make the point of order against me, or attempt to limit debate to strict conformity with the rule against every member and on every amendment to a bill or substitute for a bill to which he is opposed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman misapprehends me. My point is that if you embody all these bills in the nature of amendments to one bill there would only be a half-hour's debate upon the whole. The rule provides for one-half hour's debate on each one.

Mr. WILLIS. The amendment which I have offered to the pending bill is, as I have stated, in the nature of a substitute for the bill.

He has offered amendments to reduce the amount $100,000, to reduce it $75,000, to reduce it $50,000, and by each proposition of that sort, differing widely from the preceding, he has consumed the time of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. On this point of order I desire to say a word, without wishing to take up unnecessarily the time of the committee. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill, which makes an appropriation for a public building at Pittsburgh, and to insert in lieu of the matter stricken out a proposition in relation to a public building at Pittsburgh and in relation to a public building at Louisville, Ky. The proposition so far as it relates to Louisville, Ky., is embraced in another bill pending in this House. It is a separate and distinct measure pending in the House. The analogy is the same as if a private bill for the relief of a private individual were pending, and you proposed to add to that a proposition to relieve another person, which is against the rule, as you will see by examining the Digest.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to have that decision read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call attention to this statement, on page 224 of the Digest:

It is also out of order to ingraft upon a bill for the relief of one individual a provision for the relief of another.

Now, this is a public bill, and the analogies are precisely the same. The proposition offered is not germane to the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. That has been decided a dozen times.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not germane to a bill in relation to a public building at Pittsburgh to extend the time for a public building at Louisville. The amendment relates to another subject, and the rule states—

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

This is as different a proposition from the original bill as it is possible for propositions to differ from each other. They are as wide apart as Louisville is distant from Pittsburgh. I make, then, that point, that it is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

Again, it is not in accordance with the rule adopted on last Monday. That rule provided that the bills to which it relates should be considered in the order named by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Here is a bill about to be brought up for our consideration, not in the order suggested by the committee, but out of its order, by way of an amendment. And it is suggested to me that the bill is not even on the Calendar and is not embraced in the order at all.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to say yesterday that the law for this committee was the special order for the consideration of these bills. I would like him to answer this question: How he undertakes to invoke a rule of this House to shut off this amendment when he says the law of the House was the special order adopted on Monday?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer the gentleman, and with pleasure. I stated yesterday that the special order revoked every rule that was inconsistent with it and no other. This rule is not inconsistent with the order at all, but is one of the rules not affected by the order of the House.

So far as the other rules of this House are concerned, not affected and changed by that rule, they are all in force in this debate; and one is that these bills shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where we are now considering them. The rule I have cited is not affected at all by the order passed on Monday last.

Mr. WILLIS. My attention has been called privately to clause 7 of Rule XVI, which declares:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

I desire to say in reply to that suggestion from a friend, that the subject-matter of this bill is to extend the limit upon a public building. That is the whole of it.

Mr. LONG. No; it is to extend the limit upon a public building at a certain place.

Mr. WILLIS. The subject-matter is the extension of the limit on a public building. The substitute is upon this same subject and for the same amount, the extension of the limit upon another public building as well as that contained in the original bill, the one being at Louisville, the other at Pittsburgh. But both propositions refer to the same subject-matter, both embrace the same amount; and I hold, therefore, the substitute is not properly open to criticism as coming within this section 7 of Rule XVI.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I desire to make one remark in justice to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. In reply to a remark by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], I desire to say that I do not understand the committee have directed that this bill should be offered as an amendment to the bill relating to the public building at Pittsburgh.

Mr. WILLIS. In justice to myself I desire to make one statement. The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is undoubtedly right as to there having been any formal action by the committee. But I am equally right in saying what I said before, that this amendment was offered after consultation with and by the consent of the gentleman representing Pittsburgh, and after consultation with and by the consent of every member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds whom I could see yesterday, and I think I saw all except two, who were absent. That was my statement.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Would it be in order for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to accept a substitute embracing all the bills for public buildings which they have now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is hardly a parliamentary inquiry. As a matter of fact, perhaps the ruling of the Chair will answer the question put by the gentleman.

Mr. THOMPSON. It seems you are permitted to offer by a substitute what you can not directly offer by an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has raised the point of order against the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky and based it substantially on two grounds. The Chair desires to state these grounds, that the committee may understand upon what his decision rests. The first ground on which the gentleman from Indiana bases his point of order is that the subject-matter of the amendment is different from that of the bill, and therefore the amendment is obnoxious to the last sentence of the seventh clause of Rule XVI, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the pending bill relates to a public building in Pennsylvania; the proposition of the amendment relates to a public building in Kentucky. The inclination of the mind of the Chair is that the two propositions are entirely distinct, and if this question were a new one the Chair would decide that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] related to a subject different from that covered by the original bill.

This question, however, is not a new question, but has been decided in a case somewhat analogous by Mr. Speaker Lynn Boyd. The case on which Mr. Boyd decided was this: The original bill proposed to donate certain public lands to the State of Wisconsin in aid of the construction of a railroad from Chicago to the head of Lake Superior. The amendment proposed to donate certain lands for a similar purpose to the State of Kentucky. Against that amendment a point of order was raised, and the Speaker decided that the amendment was relevant and overruled the point of order. The Clerk will read the decision.

The Clerk read as follows:

The said amendment having been read,

Mr. George W. Jones made the point of order that it was not relevant to the bill under consideration, but was on a different subject, and consequently under the fifty-fifth rule was out of order.

The Speaker stated that inasmuch as the bill provides for a donation of land to a State for railroads therein, it was competent to amend it by a provision for a donation to other States for similar purposes. He therefore overruled the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The fifty-fifth rule referred to by Mr. Speaker Boyd was identical with the clause of the present rule of the House which has been read by the Clerk. The Chair will state further that he has been advised, though he has not had an opportunity to give personal examination to the ruling, that it has been decided that on a bill to admit a particular Territory as a State in the Union an amendment providing for the admission of another Territory as a State was relevant.

The Chair would state further on this question that wherever a point of order is raised on the ground that the proposed amendment is not relevant to the pending bill, if there be any reasonable doubt, the Chair thinks that the doubt should be resolved in favor of the relevancy of the proposed amendment, so as to give to the committee an opportunity to dispose of the whole question, as well of relevancy as of expediency. With reference to this ground of the point of order in this case, while the mind of the Chair is not in accord with the ruling of Mr. Speaker Boyd, still the Chair, rather than undertake to overrule that decision, would submit the point of order to the committee for the determination of the committee. This course the Chair would now take, if alleged irrelevancy were the only ground on which the point of order is based.

But an additional ground for the point of order is based upon the fourth clause of Rule XXI of the House, which the Chair will direct the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. It is admitted that the matter embraced in the proposed amendment is the substance of another bill now pending before the House. Such being the case, the Chair holds that it is obnoxious to the rule, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I will modify my amendment, in view of the decision of the Chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 1232) authorizing claimants to the Rancho de Napa, in Napa County, California, to prove up their title; and

A bill (S. 1413) to empower the Secretary of War to examine the claim of the State of South Carolina for rent alleged to be due for the use and occupation of the Citadel Academy at Charleston.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PITTSBURGH, PA.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the bill in relation to a public building at Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. WILLIS. I had intended to offer an amendment which I think would meet the ruling of the Chair, but upon an intimation by some gentlemen that they think it would jeopardize the passage of the bill I will not do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out "$1,500,000" and inserting "$1,000,000."

Mr. HOPKINS. The time allowed for the consideration of this bill having expired before the point of order on the last amendment was raised——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that limitation of thirty minutes was only as to debate, not as to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the Chair hold that this amendment is subject to debate?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to be offered, but is not debatable.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say that the amount I have named is $200,000 more than the sum given for the Brooklyn building.

Mr. HOPKINS. And $200,000 less than the architect says this building can be completed for.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not debatable.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN; and upon a division there were—ayes 38, noes 89.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 42, noes 120.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 95, noes 21.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I make the point that no quorum has voted. I think we should have a quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. HOPKINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 141, noes 31.

So the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. By instruction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I now call up the bill (H. R. 1484) for the erection of a public building at Chattanooga, Tenn.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the customs officers, United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices, at the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $100,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Tennessee shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG], who reported the bill.

Mr. YOUNG. I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. DIBRELL].

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask for the reading of the report. If the House will hear this report and afterward a brief statement in regard to this case, I think no member will object to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read; but it must come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. DIBRELL. All right.

The report (made by Mr. YOUNG) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1484) to erect a public building in the city of Chattanooga, Tenn., respectfully submit the following report:

The city of Chattanooga is a prosperous, growing, manufacturing city, situated on the south bank of the Tennessee River, which drains a territory of more than 30,000 square miles. Chattanooga is the principal distributing and shipping point of all the produce shipped down said river. It is the terminus of seven prominent railroads. The United States district and circuit courts are held regularly at that place, and the business of said courts is rapidly increasing, owing to the large commercial business done at Chattanooga. The population of the city by a recent enumeration is near 25,000.

Chattanooga is a port of entry. The Roan Iron Company, engaged in the manufacture of steel rails, paid $150,000, in 1882, duty upon steel blooms, &c. The depression in prices the last year stopped their manufacture until the receipts were greatly reduced.

The post-office receipts for one quarter only, ending 1st January, 1884, were $8,000 and upward, and increasing so rapidly that larger postal facilities are necessary.

When the Tennessee River is opened for free navigation Chattanooga will be the principal shipping point for a large territory in several States.

As Tennessee is a large and populous State with only four public buildings, your committee are of the unanimous opinion that a public building should be erected at Chattanooga, and therefore recommend the passage of said bill.

Mr. DIBRELL. Mr. Chairman, Chattanooga is the terminus of seven important railroads, and an eighth is now being constructed. It is one of the largest manufacturing towns in the South. Only last week a 200-ton furnace was started there. Two weeks ago a subscription was begun, and on the first day $200,000 subscribed, to erect another blast-furnace there. When the Tennessee River shall have been opened by removing the obstruction at Muscle Shoals we shall have water communication with New Orleans and other important points. In the course of ten years Chattanooga will be a city of 50,000 population.

Last year there were erected there eighty-seven storehouses, ranging from two to four stories high, and between four hundred and five hundred dwellings, a large number costing from $10,000 to $15,000 each. The Methodist Episcopal Church North has established a Southern university at Chattanooga, and during this year will expend from $50,000 to $100,000 in the erection of buildings. The Roan Iron Company, as stated in the report, has paid from $120,000 to $150,000 per annum as import dues upon steel blooms for the manufacture of steel rails. These duties had to be paid at Norfolk and Savannah. But Chattanooga is now by law a port of entry. There is an important signal station there. The marine-hospital funds are collected and disbursed there. The United States circuit and district courts sit there, and the statement here in a Chattanooga paper is that when the State courts are in session there is frequently no room for the jury and they have to go out of doors to deliberate upon their verdict because no accommodations can be obtained convenient to the court-house.

All that is wrong in this bill is that it does not appropriate enough money. My constituents are complaining of me because I do not ask for a larger appropriation. It seems to me that no man here, if he will consider the necessity for a public building at Chattanooga, and the very moderate appropriation proposed in this bill, can refuse to vote for it.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] rise to oppose the bill?

Mr. McCOMAS. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to fifteen minutes.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in opposition to the class of bills which are included in this long catalogue of bills reported favorably from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, aggregating $6,068,000 so far as heard from in the bills in this House, and about $3,000,000 in bills passed by the Senate and now on the Speaker's table. I am aware that some of the Senate bills are duplicates of those reported by the House committee, but the total makes a sum of at least $8,000,000 to be expended for purposes which, so far as I can satisfy my judgment as a Representative, do not warrant the expenditure, especially when it is to be made with insufficient opportunity for consideration and without any prior investigation; for the partial and roseate statements of the member from the district seeking the aid of the National Government is after all the argument of the advocate. The report of the member as a subcommittee is rather a restatement of this appeal than a thorough investigation, and the favorable report of the committee, whose manifold public duties prevent a thorough inquiry, is only the result they reach by conjecture upon the data they can obtain.

The gentlemen who compose this committee in respect of character and capacity are the peers of any on this floor, but they inherit a method which is execrable, inadequate, and which ought to be reformed. In 1862 when Congress appropriated but $6,000 for public buildings no evil results could follow. A committee sitting at the Capitol had time to inform itself when its inquiry was limited to several buildings proposed in one or two States. But what shall be said in favor of such a method for a committee which can only afford a couple of hours each week wherein it is compelled to pass upon applications for hundreds of buildings in all the States and Territories of this country, hearing only statements in favor of the application, having no reports of engineers or architects, and without the inspection for which many of the paid special agents of the Government or the paid officers of its Army or Departments might be made responsible.

In times of peace, when Congress and the people find a large surplus revenue at hand, the most insidious temptation to extravagance, the situation portrayed in this table is the legitimate result of such a faulty method.

NOTE.—Those marked with a * are increases over former appropriations—in the case of H. R. 1339 the limit of cost being increased to $1,500,000.

Mr. Chairman, it is, I know, an ungracious thing to oppose the wishes of gentlemen who, pressed by local interests and reasons of moment to them, are urging these measures, but I think it is a duty to resist this combined effort to erect forty public buildings. Is it proper that the House, which has now for two days been voting the expenditure of sum after sum for these purposes, should recklessly continue this procedure until the aggregate of these vast sums voted for in Committee of the Whole have been appropriated.

Do the members of this House know that in the course of a century only about two hundred public buildings have been erected in the States and Territories by the Government outside of the District of Columbia? Do you know that although you have within one hundred years built only two hundred public buildings you are now proposing to build over forty in a single session of Congress, of a Congress vaunting itself as the most economical of all economical Congresses that has ever sat in this country? Do you know further we have in this whole Union expended for public buildings outside the District of Columbia up to 1883 but $83,429,839, and yet the Senate bills on this Calendar reach nearly $3,000,000, while the House bills aggregate $6,068,000? In other words, it is proposed to appropriate for public buildings at one session one-tenth of all that has been appropriated for public buildings since the foundation of the Government.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a question.

Mr. McCOMAS. I regret that I can not do so, as the time I have is barely enough for myself.

I put it to gentlemen here who are officially charged with the responsibilities of legislation, and who on the other side of this House daily assume they have been sent here as Democrats to Congress because they represent the careful economy which the people of this country demand and require, to tell the House upon what system this long list of public buildings has been made up. I find there are twenty-three Democratic districts and thirteen Republican districts represented in this list so far as it has been made up. Is that the sort of economy to which they would invite us on this side, asking us to vote with them in swelling up the appropriation by some seven or eight millions of dollars upon these public buildings which are by favoritism and not on account of public need scattered over thirty-four States?

Can it be expected, Mr. Chairman, that any committee of gentlemen having in charge the erection of public buildings throughout the United States and making up a list including thirty-four States out of the thirty-eight should be controlled only in making appropriations of the public money by what was best for the general welfare, and that they should not be affected by a bias in favor of their own localities? In such a position they are surrounded by influences which they can not resist. I do not mean to impute improper motives to any one, but as I have said we are all affected by a bias of which we are frequently ourselves unconscious. It happens that the individual member when he comes to vote finds himself constrained against his better judgment to uphold what has been reported by the committee. The committee use the best light they can get. There is no investigation and there can be none. I say it is not worthy of the House that we should continue to make appropriations in this random way.

The members whose districts are favored are constrained to think kindly of all others in this long chain of appropriations. A chain is no stronger than its weakest link, and the member so strongly influenced by local pressure is induced unconsciously to support the weakest link that the chain may draw his own portion of it across this floor. Members from the several States are gently disarmed of opposition by the donation of a sum in their respective States, and with thirty-four States thus invited to the alliance, who can successfully resist this powerful co-operation of local interests which in the guise of a national improvement is being pressed through this House to the prejudice of all matters of great national concern? For myself, sir, I am told by these reports, vote away eight millions of the surplus if you would secure $100,000 for Annapolis.

This vicious system of combination should be stopped, and some better mode devised. Even in the river and harbor bills, against the abuses of which so much has been justly said, there is a preliminary survey before any appropriation is made for the improvement of any particular river or harbor. Some responsible officer, some responsible authority, investigates and reports all the facts, furnishes all the estimates and data necessary to advise the House as to what is proper to be done. But in this matter of the erection of public buildings, upon which we are to begin to expend such vast sums of money, nearly equaling in amount the appropriations contained in the river and harbor bills, we have no recommendations or preliminary reports of the facts involved, but are left in each case to be influenced altogether by local pressure, without regard to what is best for the public good. And we vote under an order of this House which allows only thirty minutes for debate.

Now what is the principle upon which the committee have acted? What entitles a community to a public building by an act of Congress? What excludes a community from this favor? What is the principle upon which the little town of Waco, in Texas, prosperous and growing as it is, but with a population of only six or seven thousand, gets a public building? It has a sort of carrier-pigeon court, which will sit a few weeks there and then flies to another town and then another in six different sections of the State, a court where business is not yet sufficient to make it permanent; and because a peripatetic court wants a public building in that little town of Waco we are compelled to grant it here under the local pressure brought to bear upon us and because its fate is linked with better measures. The result is that caprice and not judgment determines the matter. It is legislation by guessing, appropriation by caprice. The system half the time builds the building in the wrong place and not in the right one.

These buildings are not confined to the capitals of the States nor to the largest cities nor to the busiest towns in those States. And the mischief commences only with the first appropriation. These buildings have thus been made the bantlings of Congress. The tables I hold in my hands show they will return again and again. The caprice of the architect succeeds to the caprice of the Legislature. When the custom-house is abolished or the United States courts consolidated the building becomes useless to the nation. And this is to be apprehended in more than one of these cases. I say this in no spirit of parsimony. I favor fair and liberal appropriations for real national needs and for public buildings, as well as for all branches of the public service.

I find in the district in Maryland which I have the honor to represent, in Cumberland, Hagerstown, and Frederick, cities ranging in population from nine to fifteen thousand, three of the largest towns in that State, with manifold and rapidly growing industries, railway trains going and coming every day, and yet if they had applied for public buildings they would have been denied because they have no Government business except the post-office. They no longer have a revenue collection district located there, nor the pretext of a migratory United States court, or a miniature custom-house to veneer an appropriation. While my own town, with railroads passing in every direction, with about a hundred trains going and coming every day, with a rapidly growing population, is denied a public building, I see towns here in the list of much less importance, business, and population asking $50,000 and $150,000 for a public building, and in almost every case it is not a sentiment of nationality that is gratified, but a local town or county pride, thinly veiled by a plausible demand for a Government subsidy for a national court-house or custom-house. The Democratic party under Southern leadership, despite its constitutional objections to internal improvements, now seeks to squander millions of public moneys for purely local buildings, over which the old flag will float only to catch the appropriation.

I believe that to-day, sir, if even a tithe of the very money which you are expending here in this capricious legislation, which will aggregate millions of dollars and which will also succeed in combining a sufficient vote to sweep all these bills through the House, were to be expended to encourage the people of this broad land to build in all the towns second and third class post-offices on long leases houses for the use of the post-offices as has been recommended by Postmaster-General Gresham, to be leased at a low rental or a fair valuation to the Government, you would save money to the people of this country and give the people a thousand-fold more than you can by thus expending millions. You would carry on more successfully the flourishing operations of the postal service by adequate clerical help and in commodious houses, which service this House, instead of promoting, has already endeavored to cripple; while on the other hand you are enthusiastic in lavishing expenditures of millions on such measures as this. It does seem to me when you are going to spend in the little towns of this country from $50,000 to $150,000 and from that up to a million and a half of dollars in one city to inaugurate or continue or complete buildings without investigation from anybody or without plans it is a subject that should have a little more attention than you propose to give it here under the rule adopted for the consideration of these bills. It seems to me also that you should take note of the fact that the "extravagant" Congress which has just expired—the Republican Congress—expended, so far as I have been able to ascertain, only about $1,660,000 in all for these expenditures, while you are now called upon to expend five times that amount at one sitting.

Sir, from the very beginning of the tables, which I shall ask leave to include in my remarks, to the end you will find that the growth of each one of these buildings has far exceeded all expectations in the way of expenditure.

Every one of the bills on this long list which you have brought before this House ought to be recommitted, the whole body of them, with instructions to the committee to report a general law declaring what classes of buildings shall be erected by the nation, including not only forts and arsenals, barracks and lazarettos, and hospitals, as already provided by law, but custom-houses, court-houses, and post-offices of certain grades, and precisely defining the degree of public and national importance or business which will warrant such appropriation, preceding all by utilizing the civil and military officers already in the pay of the Government to make careful investigations in the section of the Union concerned, make accurate reports, and let all be subject to the responsibility of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall report to Congress for its decision after intelligent consideration. In a word, be as careful about building a house as you now desire to be about building a war vessel. I know it will not be done. I know that it is an appeal made in vain. I know that there is too much of the sentiment of local gain pervading this House and that it will override all scruples of public prudence. But there ought to be a recommitment of every bill like this, with instructions to the committee to establish a standard of propriety for the guidance of this House which would admit of the erection of public buildings only after due investigation and careful examination and preliminary survey and estimate.

This Democratic Congress, and my Republican brethren might as well bear it in mind, by these bills and the impending river and harbor bill are about to expend more money in one session, although professing to be opposed to internal improvements, than the old Whig party ever expended in all its administration of this Government. You will expend for local purposes and local pride more money than you have denied for public purposes.

You will deny to the clerks of the post-offices, as you have done already, less than $1,000,000, which will go home to all the people of all the land, giving much-needed facilities, and yet spend seven times that amount in this capricious legislation. You will deny the country here a navy, and you have already cut off all hope of building more war vessels, which might have been the pride and the glory and the defense of this nation, in order to squander these millions of money here to throw it away in districts where local influences and ofttimes political purposes are the ruling motives, the inception and final approval of these vast building projects.

Now, Mr. Chairman, for myself, being held in the dark and finding out the light as best I can, I do not consider that the reports of the committee which accompany these bills for public buildings, or the ten or twenty reports which will dispose of $8,000,000, and which are all reported by one man and considered, perhaps, in a perfunctory manner, perhaps looked at by the committee, I do not believe that it is the right and proper method of presenting a subject for our consideration, and I shall object to each one of them and vote only for a few of them when I am convinced there is an actual national need, voting against the most of them because they do not measure up to that high standard of public usefulness which requires the expenditure of the people's money. A surplus shall not tempt me to public extravagance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I shall ask leave to print in the RECORD the remainder of my remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to devote much of the little time I have at my command to the advocacy of this particular bill, its claims to the support of the House having been sufficiently set out by my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] and the report of the committee which accompanies it. I only desire at present to submit a few remarks touching the general policy of constructing public buildings, and in vindication of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds against the unjust and unfounded charges which several gentlemen have seen proper to prefer against it since the discussion of the various bills which it has reported to the House was commenced.

If the committee of which I am a member, and in whose behalf I speak, as well as three-fourths of the members of this House, are to be held up before the people of the country as jobbers and spoilsmen and put upon trial for the alleged commission of these offenses against legislative propriety and decency, I for one propose to examine somewhat the charges made against me, and in order to enable the public to judge intelligently of my guilt or innocence I also propose to show the character and credibility of the witnesses by whose testimony I am to be convicted. Before referring further, however, to our accusers and the credit which should be given to their testimony, I desire to say that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in reporting every bill which they have caused to be placed on the Calendar, and in every recommendation made by them, have been actuated by as high a sense of public duty as ever prompted the conduct and action of any committee of this or any other Congress. So far from their recommendations involving an extravagant and needless expenditure of public money, as has been so frequently charged by gentlemen either ignorantly or thoughtlessly, I maintain that the bills which they have reported are all in the interest of public economy, and that a large saving of public money would be secured by their passage. This fact I can easily demonstrate, if I can have the time to do so, not by any argument of mine, but by the logic of facts and figures which I shall endeavor to submit before the conclusion of my argument.

One would suppose from the alarm and trepidation manifested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER], that the erection of a public building is a great public calamity, and that the Treasury of the Federal Government had been kept depleted from the day of its organization up to the present time by the building of these "costly structures," as they term them. From the great outcry which they make against this alleged raid upon the Treasury, it might be concluded by those as little imformed upon the subject as they seem to be that hundreds of millions of dollars had been expended in the construction of public buildings, whereas the truth is that only two hundred and four have been authorized for the entire country from the foundation of the Government up to the present time, and fifty of these have not yet been completed, and all of the money expended upon them up to the 1st day of July, 1883, amounted to less than $80,000,000.

I venture to say that there is no other country in the world containing more than 50,000,000 of people, and an extent of territory equal to ours, that has expended so small an amount of money in the erection of public buildings. In extent of territory, wealth of resources, growth, progress, and enterprise, this country is unequaled by any other one in existence. And yet we have expended but this comparatively small sum of money in prosecution of works which evidence our nationality and greatness. Of course this computation does not include the Capitol building and those for the accommodation of the various Government Departments in the District of Columbia. I have no data at hand from which to calculate the cost of these latter buildings, but whatever it may have been, and however numerous and extensive they may be, it is a fact well known to every member of this House that they are even now wholly insufficient for the demands of the public service, and that the erection of additional ones is every day urged upon Congress. As to whether or not the buildings recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and which created so much commotion among a small minority of the House, are needed for the public service, let the following figures speak:

We are now paying $1,400,000 per annum for the rent of buildings in different parts of the country in which to transact our public business, an amount sufficient to pay the interest at 10 per cent. per annum on $14,000,000, at 5 per cent. on $28,000,000, and at 3½ per cent. on more than $40,000,000, twice the amount that would be required to erect every public building at present demanded for the use of the Government.

From statements furnished me by the heads of different Departments I learn that they pay rent as follows:

|---|---|
| Interior Department | $148,180 |
| Post-Office Department | 328,332 |
| Treasury Department | 319,722 |
| War Department | 544,449 |

This is exclusive of what rents may be paid by the Navy Department and the Agricultural and Medical Bureaus; so that it is not improbable that the total amount of rents paid by the Government will aggregate altogether more than one million and a half of dollars. Now, I respectfully submit to the unselfish and patriotic statesmen who have so vehemently opposed the recommendations of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds which is the wiser and more economical course for us to pursue: to continue paying a rental for public buildings amounting within itself to more than half the expenditure advised by the committee, or to appropriate the small amount of money covered by these various bills for the construction of buildings which the Government itself would own. In the light of the figures I have just given, is it economy to rent or to build houses for the Government?

It may be economy to continue the present system of renting and to advocate it may be statesmanship, but I doubt if many people will believe it. These gentlemen who assail us so vigorously and undertake to lecture us in respect to our duty to the public are some of them older Democrats than I am perhaps, but none of them have been or will, I apprehend, in the future be more loyal to the principles and teachings of the party to which I belong than myself. They tell me that I am paving the way for Republican success at the next Presidential election by advising the House to adopt and pass measures involving a wasteful and extravagant expenditure of money. I heard this same doctrine of economy preached by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] and other statesmen like him in the Forty-fourth Congress, and what was the result? We came into that Congress with a majority of seventy-four in the lower House and submitted to the leadership of the gentleman and others educated in his peculiar school of economy and cut down expenditures more than $20,000,000. This, however, did not seem to have the effect which should follow the gentleman's logic, for we came back to the Forty-fifth Congress with our majority reduced more than one-half. We continued the policy of economy recommended by the gentleman, and in the Forty-sixth Congress we barely had a majority at all. And still following the same leadership and the same teachings the Forty-seventh Congress found a clear majority against us, and the Speaker's gavel was placed in the hands of a Republican. If this is the result of your economy, if this is the outcome of your leadership, you had better abandon the one and abdicate the other in favor of a different policy and wiser leaders. My friend from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] reminds me of my duty to the Democratic party and what the public expects at my hands and that of every other member of the House. He says that we were sent here to reform existing abuses and to secure an economical administration of the Government. What are the abuses the people expected us to reform when they sent us here? Was it to stop the construction of public buildings and to keep locked up in the Treasury $100,000,000 paid by the people under an unjust and oppressive system of taxation? No, sir; this is not the character of economy and reform which was expected at our hands.

You and I, as well as a majority of the members of this House, were sent here under instructions from our constituents not to wrangle over the construction of a few public buildings, but to effect a reformation in reference to a great vital question of political economy and a method and system of taxation that affects most nearly the interests of every man in the country. I ask my friend what he has done in that direction and what he proposes to do? Does he propose to go on collecting taxes under the present system until a few hundred millions more of money is taken from the pockets of the people and hidden away in the vaults of the Treasury? Is it wiser and more statesmanlike to do this than to expend a few millions of dollars in a way which will benefit not only the public, but the laborers, artisans, and poorer class of the people? I ask my friend from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] if he believes that it was a wiser measure of statesmanship to lend $70,000,000 at 4 per cent. interest to the dealers in and manufacturers of whisky than to expend two or three millions of dollars in the employment of some of the idle but willing hands now seeking an opportunity to grasp the implements of labor?

Mr. THOMPSON. I would like to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. YOUNG. I have not time to yield.

Mr. THOMPSON. You should not ask a man a question and then decline to hear him answer it.

Mr. YOUNG. I think your answer would be a question to me, so I will say that I would have supported your bill perhaps if I had been here.

Mr. WOLFORD. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOLFORD. In debate has a gentleman the right to put a question to another gentleman and then refuse to wait for an answer to his question?

Mr. YOUNG. I will gladly hear my friend from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] to-morrow, but now I have but ten minutes, and I must use that to say a few things more to these gentlemen which I think needs to be said. I desire to ask a question or two of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], a gentleman for whom nobody has a higher regard than I have. I would like to know of him what were his ideas of political economy and of relief to the people from burdensome taxation when on Monday last he voted for a measure which would, according to the testimony of his eloquent colleague [Mr. HURD], have taken from the pockets of the poorer class of people many millions of dollars by compelling them to pay higher prices for all the woolen goods they are compelled to use.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not agree with my colleague as to that.

Mr. YOUNG. That may be; you may have too much wool in your district, but judging from the vote on the question a very large majority of your party agree with him, and if the proposition had been to restore the tariff upon any other article now on the free-list you would, I suppose, have denounced it as eloquently as your colleague did.

The gentleman from Ohio has given us some refreshing historical information in respect to public buildings and their effect upon the rise, progress, and downfall of nations and governments which was not heretofore in possession of the House and is only known to scholars and men of antiquarian research and learning. I never heard before that the enterprise and public spirit of a people led in any way to the downfall or destruction of their government, but on the contrary it has been my belief, formed from the little I have learned of history, that these were the evidences of vitality and strength. If history discloses any other fact it has escaped my observation.

The gentleman drew a beautiful rural picture of the Romans when they were wandering with their wives and children, their flocks and herds, over the hills and valleys that surround the Eternal City, dwelling without houses in the open air. My colleague [Mr. MCMILLIN] embodied in chaste and classic language a beautiful poetic idea when he declared a day or two since "that the splendid public buildings of the country were the crowned and turreted mausoleums of dead and buried liberty." This is poetry, but poetry only; the element of fact does not enter into it. In short, there was more poetry than truth or logic in the eloquent declamation of my colleague. Let me ask of both him and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] if it is their opinion that works of public improvement erected by the labor of the people under the patronage of the Government tend to debauch the one or destroy the other? Do they believe that Rome was greater when its people were semi-savages, clothed in the skins of wild beasts, and dwelling in tents and caves, than they were when they had built their splendid water ways and aqueducts, their Coliseum and amphitheaters, when they had erected temples and palaces, and when Cæsar at the head of his invincible legions had overthrown and conquered every surrounding nation and compelled their people to acknowledge its greatness and pay tribute to Rome?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman is up.

Mr. YOUNG. I did not think my time had expired.

Mr. DIBRELL. I will yield what time I have left to my colleague and will be glad for him to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] will proceed.

Mr. YOUNG. I want to ask these gentlemen further, if they believe that France was greater under the reign of the Bourbons or under the following empire? Under the former France languished and declined, debauchery reigned at the court, public works were unknown, idleness and poverty prevailed all over the kingdom, the people were turbulent and lawless, clamoring for bread or for work. Under the latter the Champs Elysées and boulevards of Paris were constructed, public roads and public buildings were erected all over France, peace and quiet were restored, the people were given work, and industry and thrift took the place of idleness and poverty. Now I ask these economic statesmen, these learned students of history, if they believe that the French Government was more popular and powerful when the mob of Paris was besieging the Tuileries while Louis XVIII was trembling upon his throne, or when the great Napoleon at the head of his army was carrying the eagles of France across the bridge at Lodi, dictating peace at Campo Formo, or overthrowing the allied powers of Europe on the field of Austerlitz? The gentleman points to Russia as illustrative of the effect of his theory of economy upon governments. That country, I suppose, is his ideal of one ruled by a government of economy.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I did not name Russia.

Mr. YOUNG. Then you name Prussia, I suppose.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, Germany.

Mr. YOUNG. There is no Germany now; it is all Prussia. Take that government then, where tyranny and despotism are written on every page of its history, where the whole legislative and executive power is wielded by one iron hand at the bidding of the king. In Prussia there are no public buildings, I infer from the statement of my friend. In Prussia there is no liberty as known and understood in this country. Then it follows, I suppose, from the logic of my friend, if his theory be correct, that in countries where there are no public buildings, absolute despotic tyranny is the ruling attribute of government. If the practice of his system of economy has worked this effect in Prussia, I trust it will never be received with public favor in this country.

A MEMBER. Tell him about Egypt.

Mr. YOUNG. Ah, yes; thank you. I will analyze another one of his illustrations. Does he think that the Egypt of to-day, the plaything of Europe and the prey of every surrounding nation, is stronger than it was in the days when the pyramids were reared and the palaces of the Ptolemies were builded?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is it—symbols of power.

Mr. YOUNG. Yes, sir, and symbols of progress too; evidences not only of the growth and greatness of a government, but of its dignity and power as well. By your theory you would give less dignity and respectability to the Federal Government than is possessed by a State, or even a county or municipality. Nearly every State, county, and city in the country constructs and owns enough of buildings for the transaction of their business, and few individuals will live in a rented house if they have means to build one of their own.

The disadvantage under which the Government must necessarily labor in the renting of buildings for public use is too apparent to every one to admit of dispute. It is not usual that more than one or two buildings in any given locality can be found which are suitable for public purposes; hence there is ordinarily no competition, and the Government is left a victim to the rapacity of those who chance to own the buildings, and I think it extremely probable that the Government pays upon an average for rent more than 10 per cent. upon the value of the buildings rented.

Hon. PETER V. DEUSTER made a report from the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings to the Forty-sixth Congress in respect to the custom of renting, which contains some valuable information on this subject, and points out most strongly the abuses of the entire system.

I submit the following extract from that report, which I shall ask to have printed with my remarks, and I trust that the gentlemen who have manifested such activity in guarding the public interests will give it a careful perusal:

The Secretary of the Interior makes return of $32,700 paid for rent of buildings required here in Washington for his Department. Said amount is made up as follows:

The "Jessup building" (Pension Office), corner Twelfth street and Pennsylvania avenue, for which $20,000 rent is paid for the upper stories. This rent is equivalent to a fraction over 13 per cent. of the assessed or salable value of the property; "Wright property," corner of G and Eighth streets, costs $7,200, which is 17 per cent. of "assessed" value of the building; Johnson property, northwest corner G and Eighth streets, costs $1,500, or over 13 per cent. of its assessed value; "Barnard" building, corner Thirteenth and Pennsylvania avenue, costs $4,000, which is equivalent to 6.25 per cent. of the assessed value of the property.

The Secretary of this (Interior) Department, in answer to the request of the committee for his official statement of rents paid, replies:

"The length of time required to obtain similar information of all the buildings rented by this Department throughout the country would be so great (perhaps several months) that it is deemed inexpedient to undertake it, unless you regard it of great importance, in which event you will please advise me."

The Department of Justice in 1878 reported annual rents paid amounting to $86,905; and this amount very nearly approximates what is required at the present time.

The Navy Department reported in 1878 $13,400 throughout the country, and now pays for use of buildings in this city about $2,000 per annum for rent.

The Department of Agriculture pays no rent whatever.

The resolution calls for information in regard to the "assessed and salable" value of the rented premises, and as such data can not be given without sending agents all over the country to assess and estimate the real value of the property it would be almost an endless undertaking to obtain full and accurate information to the extent called for.

Your committee, therefore, having investigated this subject as far as possible at this time, submit these views and figures. We add that in the opinion of your committee it is an unwise policy on the part of the Government to pay rents from year to year that are equivalent to 5, 6, 10, and even as high as 20 per cent. of the value of the property rented.

The total amount annually expended for rented premises in all the Departments exceeds one and a quarter millions of dollars, a sum equivalent to 4 per cent. interest on more than thirty-one millions of dollars. This amount judiciously expended would construct several hundred handsome public buildings, enough to supply the needs of the public service for half a century to come, and put one in every important city in the Union not already supplied.

Of course much of this aggregate amount is made up of small sums required for many unimportant places, where rent is paid for the use of rooms and offices for the customs service, Internal Revenue, and Post-Office Departments, in towns and villages throughout the States and Territories. But that the Government is needlessly spending money for rent can not be questioned or denied.

Your committee would further suggest that the inconvenience, trouble, and expense that would follow frequent or sudden removals to some extent places the Government in the power of the owners of the rented premises and endangers the safety of the public records.

What is true in respect to renting buildings for public use in the District of Columbia as set out in the above report is true in a greater or less degree throughout the entire country, and from the information I have been able to obtain on the subject, I am of the opinion that the abuse is greater elsewhere than here in Washington city.

Gentlemen who manifest such energy and zeal in combating measures of legislation as has been exhibited by the four or five gentlemen who have been conspicuous in their opposition to the bills reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds ought, it would seem, to possess at least a reasonable degree of information concerning a matter they have discussed so much and so intemperately, but it does not appear to have occurred to them that it was at all necessary to take the trouble of acquainting themselves with the facts. I say this because there seems to be a sharp rivalry between them as to who shall talk longest and talk, most in order, I presume, to prevent as little talking as possible by those who are in a condition at least to give them some information, which it seems they do not possess. And I am further led to this inference from the fact that they do not seem even to have read a single report accompanying the bills, and they have continually and persistently perverted and misrepresented the facts, though I do not charge that they did so purposely, but rather in the inconsiderate haste with which they have rushed into this debate.

Now, it is a somewhat ungracious task to expose their fanciful and unsupported statements, but I am of opinion that the House would like to act advisedly in this matter, and I am not altogether without hope that the gentlemen themselves, when informed as to the exact state of affairs, will agree with me that these measures are not only demanded in the interest of public economy, but that they will benefit in a very proper and substantial manner a large class of people who sorely need it. It has been loosely asserted in different forms of expression by nearly all of the gentlemen who have done the speaking for the opposition that the committee has reported anywhere from forty to sixty bills, involving an expenditure ranging anywhere from eight or ten to an indefinite number of millions of dollars. The gentlemen might as well have stated the number of bills to be five hundred and the expenditures at a thousand million of dollars. This would have been just as easy and only a little further removed from the facts. The committee up to this time have reported but thirty bills altogether for the erection of new buildings and the enlargement of those already authorized by previous acts of Congress.

The expenditure recommended for new buildings only amounts to $2,842,000, while that recommended for the enlargement of buildings already authorized and in process of construction amounts to $1,811,000 making a total of $4,653,000. A considerable discrepancy thus appears between the facts and the extravagant statements of these gentlemen. But they say, "What about the Senate bills?" I answer that I am not a Senator and did not report them, but when they come before the House for its action, unlike the gentlemen, I shall endeavor to inform myself concerning their merits, and then vote for or against them as my judgment and sense of duty dictate.

For the information of my friends, however, as they seem to need information in respect to the Senate as well as to the House bills, I will state that those bills which have so far passed the Senate and been reported to the House aggregate $1,000,725, but the larger part I believe of the appropriation asked for in these bills is also for the enlargement of buildings already authorized.

It is not my purpose, however, to defend the Senate bills nor the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; I only hold myself responsible for the action of the House committee. By that I shall stand, and am willing to submit my action on that issue to the public judgment.

It has been charged that these bills were not carefully and intelligently considered by the committee; that they were unsupported by the recommendation of any Government official or heads of Departments, all of which is the product and outgrowth of an undisciplined fancy. Every bill was carefully considered after having been submitted to the head of the Department having control of public buildings and an estimate furnished of how much the proposed building should cost. This was as to the construction of new buildings, while in respect to those buildings for the enlargement of which the committee has recommended appropriations the proper officers of the Government have assured the committee that the proposed enlargement was an absolute public necessity, and the committee did not feel at liberty to disregard these recommendations and embarrass the public service.

The recommendations of the committee proper therefore reach to only the sum of $2,842,000, a sum less than has been appropriated by any Congress since 1872 for public buildings. I suppose, of course, the gentlemen who have been making all this outcry did not know this fact; but nevertheless it is true, as will appear from the following figures: The Forty-fourth Congress authorized and appropriated for public buildings $5,731,554; the Forty-fifth Congress, $8,037,475; the Forty-sixth Congress, $8,252,477; the Forty-seventh Congress, $13,457,800.

So far we have recommended the expenditure of vastly less money for the erection of public buildings than has been expended by any one of the last four Congresses. I am told by my friend from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] that I will defeat the Democratic party, and the country is told by him and the other gentlemen both that I and the two-thirds of the members of this House who have been acting with me are jobbers and legislative log-rollers. Perhaps if our accusers and other disciples of their school of statesmanship had talked less about imaginary economy and worked more in the interest of the real article they would have accomplished far more valuable results.

But the gentlemen say that their opposition is not so much grounded upon any objectionable feature of the bills themselves as upon the method of their passage. Now, does this objection rest upon a solid basis or upon another fanciful structure? The resolution of the House under which we are proceeding sets apart certain designated days for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and this the gentleman calls a combination of forces to secure the consideration of all these bills within a given time, or to put the proposition in the less classical but possibly more forcible formula of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON], we have brought a pot into the House in which every hungry Congressman is boiling his own pork in the shape of a custom-house for his district. As I have no pork in the pot myself, I suppose my friend will relieve me from the imputation of being actuated by any personal consideration.

But, now, what is there unusual in this proceeding? Do the gentlemen not know that it is a custom of long standing in this House to set apart a particular day for the consideration of bills reported from some one of the different committees? We have now a standing order setting apart one day in each month for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia and one day of every week for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, and yet I never heard it charged that these orders were the result of any improper combination or that the proceedings under them were in any way considered as an objectionable method of legislation. So far from this method of considering bills for the erection of public bufldings being an objectionable one I maintain that it is the fairest and safest one under which such bills were ever passed. The gentlemen know as well as I do that no bill for a public building has ever passed this House, at least within the past ten years, except under a suspension of the rules and in the most summary manner, and yet they complain that these are now being hurried through without an opportunity for discussion or amendment.

In view of the anxiety and capacity which many gentlemen have exhibited to talk long and talk often in the discussion of these measures, the wisdom of placing a limitation upon debate is most conspicuously shown, for without restraint nobody knows when they ever would have stopped.

It is a maxim of our Government, and a wise one, too, I think, that legislation should be fair and impartial, and that its benefits, whatever they may be, should be equally and justly distributed, and it may be worth while to inquire whether or not this has been done in the erection of public buildings heretofore. Of the $79,000,000 which has been expended in the erection of public buildings since the beginning of the Government $36,639,121 has gone to four States alone, as follows:

|---|---|
| Missouri | $7,093,494 29 |
| Ohio | 7,681,538 57 |
| Massachusetts | 8,207,595 07 |
| New York | 13,676,493 10 |

Which amounts to nearly one-half of the whole sum expended in the entire United States, and adding something over $7,000,000 for Pennsylvania, the amount will be swelled to more than one-half. I am not complaining of the large sums expended in these States, perhaps it was required and justified by their wealth and population and the amount of public business necessary to be transacted within their limits, but I do complain that gentlemen coming from those States so largely favored by Government benefactions should object when the States of the South and the younger ones of the West seek to obtain something like a fair share of whatever benefits may flow from this character of public legislation. I must remind them that it is scarcely kind, and certainly not generous, when Iowa, the growing young State of the West, asks for a small appropriation for a public building, nor when Texas, the Empire State of the Southwest, asks a similar favor, for them to oppose it so strenuously. But, to use the simile of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON], they have got their pork and are now unwilling to feed their hungry brethren. No wonder the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] can afford to play the rôle of bold, patriotic, and disinterested legislators when it is considered that their States between them have received from the national Treasury for the erection of custom-houses something over $14,000,000, and that there is no town in the district of either one of them large enough to build a custom-house in.

But I shall not rely upon refuting the flimsy arguments of the gentlemen who have assailed us for the vindication of the action of my committee. I shall place its defense upon the broad ground of a wise public policy, and one that will commend itself to the common sense of the people. With more than a hundred millions of dollars of surplus revenue in the Federal Treasury, paid by the people in the discharge of unnecessary and unequal taxes, I will risk their judgment upon my conduct when I endeavor in a legitimate manner to return some of it to the source from which it was gathered. Better expend it for the benefit of the people in wages for their industry and labor than to let it remain where it is, a constant temptation to the thousand jobbers always ready to depredate upon the public Treasury. There are all over the country thousands of honest, industrious laborers willing to work and seeking employment. Why not, therefore, expend for their benefit a few millions of the money which they have paid into the Treasury, while at the same time you will be prosecuting public works required by the exigencies of the public service?

When an opportunity is presented I will endeavor to reply further to the arguments which I have noticed only briefly in my remarks for want of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more; everybody else has talked himself to death but me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks consent for five minutes additional time. Is there objection?

Mr. YOUNG. I want to ask my friend, pursuing this subject further, if he can point to any nation in history——

Mr. THOMPSON. If this debate is to be continued, I want it continued for an hour longer.

Mr. YOUNG. Well; I would be glad to take an hour longer.

Mr. HARDEMAN. If we give this privilege to one we should give it to all.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. HARDEMAN. I must object.

Mr. YOUNG. Then I ask the privilege of printing the further remarks I desire to make, or I will avail myself of some opportunity tomorrow to make additional remarks.

Mr. DIBRELL. I now move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that motion is put, I move to amend by reducing the appropriation from $100,000 to $75,000.

Mr. DIBRELL. I hope that will not be done.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN; and upon a division there were—ayes 24, noes 98.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend by inserting these words:

Provided, That this building shall be constructed of brick or durable stone.

If this building is to be for use and not as a "symbol of power," that amendment should be adopted.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio; and upon a division there were—ayes 7, noes 98.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon laying the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 110, noes 14.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No quorum has voted. We should have a quorum on ordering such a bill as this to be reported.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DIBRELL and Mr. WARNER of Ohio were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 139, noes 25.

So the committee ordered the bill to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AUGUSTA, ME.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. By instructions of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I now call up House bill No. 702, for the erection of a public building in the city of Augusta, Me.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Augusta, in the State of Maine, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office, United States courts, internal-revenue office, pension office, and for other Government uses. The site, and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $150,000; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings, by an open space of at least fifty feet, including streets and alleys; and for the purposes herein mentioned the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to said site shall be vested in the United States; and the State of Maine shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process thereon.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I have presented this bill to the House only because I believe that the interests of the public service demand that this building should be erected. I believe that the amount of business done in the city of Augusta, Me., is such that it must be clear to members of this House that a public building is demanded there, that it will be economy for the Government to erect this building.

Augusta is the capital of the State of Maine, but it has no public building. Its post-office receipts directly from the sale of stamps are more than $83,000 annually, and the amount of post-office business transacted in that city is between six and seven hundred thousand dollars a year. In the post-office there are handled annually between eighteen and nineteen million pieces of mail matter. There is distributed there annually for pensions $2,500,000. There is an internal-revenue office there.

Augusta, Me., is the seventh city in this country in the amount of its second-class mail matter. The first is New York, the second Chicago, the third Boston, the fourth Philadelphia, the fifth Saint Louis, the sixth Cincinnati, and the seventh Augusta, Me.

Now, all this business is done in two old buildings, three hundred feet apart, with no safety-vaults; and it is done at such inconvenience that I believe it would be a saving of public money for the Government to erect a building there. Why, sir, the Government pays $3,300 a year as rent for these inconvenient buildings, which are, however, the best facilities that can be obtained for the business of the Government in that city.

Besides, sir, Augusta, if I am rightfully informed by my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who I believe is always right on statistics, is the only capital in this country, except the capital of Nevada, that has no public building at all.

Mr. Chairman, I have always believed that facts are the best arguments; therefore I ask the Clerk to read, in my time, the report of the committee, and whatever time may remain I will reserve.

The report of the committee (made by Mr. MILLIKIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 702) for the erection of a public building at the city of Augusta, in the State of Maine, would respectfully report:

That Augusta is the capital of the State, with a population of 8,666, showing a small increase during the last decade. It is situated on the Kennebec River, in the center of population in the State, has a fine and extensive water-power, has large industries in the manufacture of cotton, lumber, boots and shoes, &c., and has good railroad facilities, and is surrounded by thrifty and growing towns and cities within a radius of twenty miles.

The post-office business of Augusta for the year ending June 30, 1883, was as follows, namely:

|---|---|
| Cash receipts of office | $83,878 13 |
| Stamped third-class matter with stamps not purchased at the Augusta office | 48,051 09 |
| Receipts from money-orders issued | 37,086 02 |
| Receipts from money-order drafts | 3,650 00 |
| Receipts from money-orders deposited by postmasters | 183,571 00 |
| Amount of money-orders paid | 139,288 95 |
| Amount of money-order money deposited with Postmaster Goddard at Portland | 84,179 00 |
| Amount deposited with assistant treasurer at Boston, Mass. | 72,480 30 |
| Total postal business of the office | 652,184 49 |
| Total number of money-orders issued during the year | 2,467 |
| The number of money-orders paid during the year | 21,936 |
| Total number of sacks of newspapers sent from the office during the year | 47,378 |
| Total number of circulars sent | 5,709,180 |
| Total number of pieces of mail matter handled by letter-carriers | 1,332,663 |
| Total number of pieces of mail matter handled during the year | 18,173,928 |

In the amount of second-class mail matter for the year ending June 30, 1882, Augusta ranked as the seventh post-office in the United States, New York city being first; Chicago, second; Boston, third; Philadelphia, fourth; Saint Louis, fifth; Cincinnati, sixth; Augusta, seventh. Augusta's post-office receipts show a large increase each year since 1879, when they were $51,440, and are likely to increase in future, for they are in great part due to large publishing houses located here, which do a business which extends all over the globe, and has been increasing for more than a decade. They have extensive permanent buildings and the very best class of printing machinery, and together with the cotton and lumber industries here have a continually growing business.

We also find that this vast mail is handled in two separate buildings, more than three hundred feet apart, which is both inconvenient and unsafe, as these buildings have no fire-proof vaults, and is very expensive to the Government.

For these unsafe and inconvenient buildings the Government pays a rental of $3,300 per year; and though they are the best that can be had, they afford but poor returns in the accommodations which they give for the rental paid. It is estimated by Mr. Manley, the present postmaster, that $3,000 per year might be saved to the Government in rental and by reason of the superior facilities which a properly constructed building would afford.

There is a United States pension office at Augusta, which distributes annually $2,500,000 on account of pensions. The internal-revenue office is also located at Augusta, and at least one term of the United States court is required to be held there, on account of its central location in the State and the commercial interests which center here. Augusta is at the head of navigation on the Kennebec River, and in the midst of a large and rapidly increasing manufacturing and commercial community.

A bill similar to the one accompanying this report passed the Senate of the Forty-seventh Congress and was favorably reported to the House, but on account of the illness of Mr. Lindsey, who had charge of it, was not called up on the Calendar.

Your committee would therefore recommend that bill H. R. 702, accompanying this report, do pass, limiting the cost of said building and grounds when completed to the sum of $150,000.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. Chairman, no stereotyped sneers which may be directed against the opponents of these measures should prevent members of the House from doing their duty to the people at large. It seems to me that this "omnibus" scheme for the erection of public buildings partakes very much of the character of the river and harbor bill. No doubt there are rivers and harbors in this country which ought to be improved, and the improvement of which would be of general advantage; but under the forms of appropriations for rivers and harbors great abuses and gross waste of the money of the people have found their way into our legislation. A similar remark may be made in regard to the erection of public buildings. There are undoubtedly localities in the United States where the Government should have good substantial buildings; but in regard to matters of this kind there has been a log-rolling system. There is no man on the floor of this House who might bring a stronger case in behalf of the erection of a public building in his district than I could; but I have refrained from presenting such a proposition, because I was not willing to enter into what I consider indecent "deals" in order to secure that object. When I say "deals" I mean that natural feeling of obligation, dependence, and mutual kindness toward members with similar projects and which does not necessarily imply a direct and openly dishonorable understanding and agreement.

Mr. YOUNG. Has the gentleman introduced any bill for the erection of any building?

Mr. MCADOO. I have not.

Mr. YOUNG. Did you know in advance that the committee was going to pursue this course, and was that the reason you did not introduce any bill?

Mr. MCADOO. I knew nothing of what the committee was going to do.

Mr. YOUNG. Then that is not the reason you did not introduce a bill.

Mr. MCADOO. I did not introduce any bill because I knew the general character which the people of the country attribute to the manner in which these bills have been passed.

Mr. YOUNG. This never was done before.

Mr. MCADOO. Now, sir, it has been said——

Mr. BURLEIGH rose.

Mr. MCADOO. I must decline to yield for the present. Mr. Chairman, I think the argument that these public buildings should be erected because they represent the "moral power" of the United States is entirely fallacious. We want the power of this Government to be represented by buildings honestly erected under honest legislation, and free from all suspicion of personal interest.

Let each of these bills stand on its individual merits. The "moral power" of this Government can not be represented through this broad land by costly and palatial buildings, the legislation for which has been driven through this House by—what? By a syndicate in the interests of selfishness, by a system of legalized local larceny, symbolizing the "moral power" of this great country!

Such monuments to the "moral power" of the Republic would be bad teachers to the youth of the land, educating them to believe that the advancement of personal interest, and not patriotism, was the standard by which representative men were gauged.

The moral grandeur of our country consists in the freedom, happiness, intelligence, and prosperity of the individual citizen; not in the glitter and glare of a gorgeous display of governmental power, but in its simplicity and democracy and its strong hold on the affections of the people.

One further fact about these bills. Do gentlemen on this floor know that many of these bills are introduced here to stop the natural drift of population? Members come here from a district in which some town is languishing; natural causes are taking away its population. To stop this natural drift they propose to erect a great public building (such as a Federal court, for instance) at the expense of the Government as a stimulus to that particular locality.

In this particular instance, so far as Augusta, Me., is concerned, I am not sufficiently cognizant of the facts to vote intelligently and understandingly for or against the measure. As has been said—very ably and pertinently—by the gentleman from Maryland, we have not in these cases the same opportunity for information as in the case of the river and harbor bill. In connection with that bill (to be taken, it is true, for what they are worth) there are surveys by Government engineers whose reports we have before us. We have some facts upon which we can form our judgment. But in this case we are groping in the dark. We must depend solely on the judgment of the Representative of that particular locality; and I say with all due respect to the gentleman from Maine that he is on general principle as unfair a juror as would be the plaintiff in a particular case if he were put into the jury-box to render a verdict upon his own case. We have nothing here but the statement of the gentleman who represents the district, made through the committee or made personally upon the floor of the House.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will ask the gentleman whether he intends to reflect upon my integrity as a Representative?

Mr. MCADOO. I do not intend to reflect upon the integrity or honor of the gentleman from Maine or any other gentleman.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I desire to say to the gentleman that the figures which I have cited in this case he will find in the report of the Post-Office Department, if he will look at it. The statements are not made upon my authority as a Representative.

Mr. MCADOO. I will say that it is a disadvantage to the gentleman (as it is a disadvantage to every gentleman who is asking the passage of any of these bills) that he is more or less interested. I think the best course would be to give a lump sum to the Post-Office Department or some other Department of the General Government and make it responsible for the distribution.

To have gentlemen come here asking appropriations for buildings under the pressure of their individual interests and that of their localities, and as to its justice and necessity compelling this House to take their word for it, is, I think, without disrespect or questioning of their motives, an unfair system of legislation.

I will yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, my main purpose is to call attention to the propriety of reducing the amount of this appropriation. I had occasion to state in the first remarks I submitted to the House on this subject that there were some of these bills undoubtedly which should pass. Some of them are meritorious measures. It occurred to me, sir, that in the case of two capitals, that of Maine and that of Nevada, it would be fair and proper, inasmuch as Federal courts are held at both of those points, public buildings should be erected there. I thought, sir, there were some ten or twelve of these bills that the House, with proper regard for the public interest, might take up, consider, and pass, and I certainly should be inclined to select among those the bill now pending. The capital of Maine, the capital of Nevada, and the capital of California are the only three capitals at which public buildings have not been erected or authorized to be erected. I am told that Montpelier, Vt., has not a public building. I had overlooked that fact. As to Sacramento, in California, the overshadowing influence of the large number of public buildings at San Francisco has undoubtedly prevented the erection of a public building there.

I say again, sir, as I said at the beginning of this discussion in the House, that I thought some of these were meritorious measures and some of them ought to pass, and that the country would approve of reasonable appropriation of money for any like this at this time. I think the indignation which will be aroused over the country will be more at the method than the character of the bills which may be passed or the amounts involved. And I hope I do not overlook the fact on this side of the House that the bills being urged in the progress of this procedure are to increase appropriations which were deemed ample in the last Congress during its first session, and upon which the public judgment has already been pronounced, as has been seen in the change of the two sides of the House.

The city of Augusta, Me., had a population of 8,566 inhabitants according to the last census, being a slight advance over the population of the preceding decade, which was 7,808, showing an increase of near a thousand, a moderate and healthy increase of population. It has a court; it has a pension office, as there is a pension agent located there. And gentlemen should observe, while that argument has been urged with great pertinacity, there is a bill pending which meets with general approval reducing the number of pension agents, which will at least in this particular locality change the location of that particular agency. And that is not an unimportant question entering into the consideration of this subject.

It is proposed to appropriate $150,000. Augusta, Me., is contiguous to the great deposits of granite. I take it for granted as the principal material entering into the cost of this building there it would be cheaper than anywhere else to which our legislation applies. You have thought proper in the town of my colleague, the chairman of the committee [Mr. STOCKSLAGER], New Albany, having 26,000 people, with a Federal court, with all the other offices there except a Federal pension agency referred to by the gentleman from Maine, you have thought there an appropriation of $100,000 was sufficient. I think it is ample, and for one, although a citizen of Indiana, I would not have voted for it if that measure had contained a dollar beyond that sum. That is clear up to the average cost of public buildings in the counties and States in my own section. Thinking $100,000 was ample in Indiana, and more than ample, I think the committee should agree to scale down this building to a reasonable sum. Gentlemen should not shock the sensibility of our people by putting up buildings much more costly than those in the same region. It is not increase of space, it is not more elegant and commodious rooms, but it is the embellishments which enter into this enormous increased cost of our public edifices over the structures generally erected throughout the country. Such a building should harmonize more with the nature and genius of our Government and the necessities of the country.

I move therefore to reduce the appropriation—perfectly conscious of the propriety of the erection of this building, for it stands in my judgment among the most favored class of these buildings—but I am justifiable, I think, in asking the committee to reduce this appropriation to $100,000. If at the town of New Albany, a town of twice the population, four times in fact the population of any town named so far, $100,000 was considered sufficient, I ask you gentlemen upon what principle of public necessity and for what public reasons can you insist upon an appropriation of $150,000 for this building right at the point in your territory where the material is most readily and cheaply obtained?

I therefore move to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$100,000."

Mr. MCADOO. I desire, having reserved the remainder of my time, to add a single word to what I have already said.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. MCADOO. In that one minute I wish to state simply that in that State of Maine there are nine custom-houses that only collect $26,928, while they have public buildings aggregating in value $137,659.80. So, Mr. Chairman, they seem to have more public buildings in Maine, so far as the collection of customs duties is concerned, than they have revenues to collect.

I desire to say if that report is true of which the capable gentleman from Maine is the author——

Mr. MILLIKEN. What is that?

Mr. MCADOO. I am referring to the report in this case, prepared I believe by the gentleman himself.

Mr. MILLIKEN. But there is a better man behind me and just as capable of drawing the report.

Mr. McADOO. I am not reflecting upon the report; it is sufficiently capable. It is an able document, so far as that goes; but I was going on to say that this $150,000, if that report be correct, will not be sufficient according to the opinions expressed in the report itself, and I venture to say that, this amount being appropriated, you will find the gentleman or some other gentleman applying to the next Congress and asking that they will vote to the State of Maine an additional appropriation to carry out the work thus begun.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a few minutes, with the consent of the committee. I wish to repeat that I presented this bill to the House, as I said in the beginning of my remarks, upon the merits of the case itself, and not upon anything else whatever. I believe that the great business demands of that city require that the Government of the United States should build a good, safe, comfortable, and convenient building for the accommodation of a post-office that handles almost nineteen millions of pieces of mail matter, and does a post-office business that amounts to between six and seven hundred thousand dollars. I think this should be done for the reason that an office conducting such a business as that should not be required or expected to do it in two buildings three hundred feet apart, with no vaults for storage, and no possible safety for the public property, and at so much inconvenience that the losses occurring thereby, and the rate of $3,300 a year paid for rent, will amount to more than the interest on the $150,000 appropriated by this bill.

Now, to my friend from Indiana, whom I am very glad to find sustains me in reference to this appropriation, I wish to say a word as to the general question pertaining to the bill, and that is this: that from the very situation of affairs it is entirely necessary that this public building should be pretty near the railroad depot. You can not take it away far from this depot without great inconvenience as well as great expense to the Government.

To place it there where the post-office is now, you have got to place it in a position where land is most expensive in Augusta; and you can not purchase a site suitable for a building of this character at the point indicated for less than from $25,000 to $40,000.

I do not want, Mr. Chairman, one dollar more for this public building than is necessary to give to this Government a proper place to transact its business efficiently; and I wish to say in one sentence, in so far as all of these bills are concerned, and in answer to gentlemen who oppose them, that I should not vote for one appropriation here where I would not vote for it if I myself owned the resources of this Government, had its debts to pay, and was looking upon it personally as a business question whether I would or would not make the investment.

Mr. STORM. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds——

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STORM. And says that when he presents this bill he desires it to stand upon its own individual merits?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STORM. Now, I want to ask the gentleman whether he has not supported and voted for each of these preceding bills?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I did, sir; and I wish to say plainly to the gentleman——

Mr. STORM. I am not through with my question. You propose to vote for those that are to follow?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I propose to vote for every measure before the House which I think is just.

Mr. STORM. I ask the gentleman to answer my question.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman is now holding the floor in my own time.

Mr. STORM. No, sir; you are speaking now by the charity of this House.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not ask the House to extend its charity to me. I do not ask charity for this bill. I am speaking on my own bill and in my own time, and if the gentleman asks a question, if he is a gentleman he will listen for the answer. I say that I shall vote for every bill that comes before the House, whether from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds or from any other of the committees, which commends itself to my judgment and possesses merits which warrant my support. But I will confess to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in so far as I know as to how I am going to vote on any question, when he will show me his warrant as being my confessor.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman has yet to give an answer to the question whether he proposes to vote for the rest of the bills for public buildings on this Calendar.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will say to the gentleman that it is none of his business for what bills I shall vote.

Mr. STORM. Then the gentleman virtually says in the presence of this House that these measures are all together, cut and dried, and he proposes to stand by every bill, whether it be for Greenville, S. C., with a population of 5,000, or for Augusta, Me., with a population of 8,000, or for any other place on the list.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman says what he has no authority for saying.

Mr. STORM. You do not answer my question because you dare not say you will vote against any of those bills lest those interested in them should strike you back.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If one bill comes up that is unjust, I will vote against it.

Mr. STORM. Announce beforehand what bills you will vote against, and then see what your log-rolling will amount to.

Mr. MILLIKEN. When the gentleman speaks of log-rolling, that may be something in his own experience; it does not apply to me. The man who is a thief cries "thief." You have been talking of log-rolling all the time and you have produced no evidence of it. And I want to say the people of this country will not be deceived by this cheeseparing, canting, hypocritical talk.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. STORM. I wish to say to the gentleman——

Many MEMBERS. Vote! vote!

Mr. STORM. All I wish to say is this—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I ask three minutes' time.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If I have any time left I give it to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no time left.

Mr. STORM. I will have my say hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will be seated and the committee will come to order. [After a pause.] The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 15 strike out the word "fifty;" so that it will read: "shall not exceed the cost of $100,000."

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. My inquiry is whether the resolution assigning a day or days for the consideration of this class of business cuts off debate under the five-minute rule on amendments that may be offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Colorado that the resolution limits all debate to thirty minutes.

Mr. BELFORD. On the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. And on all amendments. It does not cut off amendments, but it prevents debate on the amendments. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 62, noes 98.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, and the gentleman from Maine, Mr. MILLIKEN.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I hope that will not be done. Let us get through with this bill.

The question being taken on Mr. THOMPSON's motion, there were—ayes 57, noes 101.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, and the gentleman from Maine, Mr. MILLIKEN, have been appointed to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 106.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

Mr. THOMPSON. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 110, noes 30.

Mr. THOMPSON. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. THOMPSON. Pending that, I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken on Mr. THOMPSON's motion, there were—ayes 55, noes 100.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill to be reported favorably to the House. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 134, noes 31.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. I now move that the committee rise.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. To call up another bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to, there being—ayes 104, noes 74.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration bills on the Calendar reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, had directed him to report back to the House sundry bills without amendments and to recommend their passage.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Friday. This is the legislative day of Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks such a motion would make no difference. If the House adjourns it will be to meet on the next legislative day, and that will be the calendar day of Friday.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is the calendar day of Thursday. If the motion I have indicated is not placed on the Journal you take no account of the day intervening between Wednesday and Friday.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman insists on his motion the Chair will entertain it.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the Chair does not think it necessary I will not insist upon it. I withdraw the motion.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 77, noes 90.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. THOMPSON called for tellers.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for the yeas and nays; we may as well have them ordered at once.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 57 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 96, nays 97, not voting 129; as follows:

The following were announced as paired on this vote:

Mr. BUCKNER with Mr. SMITH, until April 15.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to state that I am paired with Mr. GEDDES, of Ohio, on political questions. Not regarding this as one, I have voted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. TALBOTT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBOTT. I would inquire if the order of the House in relation to business reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would give that business precedence over private bills to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair prefers to decide that question when it is presented. The question now is upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COBB. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 42 in the affirmative—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The SPEAKER. Before the roll is called the Chair will lay before the House certain executive communications, and also reports from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 431) for the relief of Sally A. Spence; and

A bill (S. 874) to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, title 72, in relation to guano islands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting papers and reports on the depredation claim of William L. Robinson, Cyrus Beers, and Solomon Vaile, and of Abiel Morrison; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of the House, adopted January 23, 1884, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, inclosing a list of claims allowed in the Department of the Interior for depredations by tribes of Indians who have annuities or other funds due them from the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that that communication be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There was no objection, and the communication, with the accompanying papers, was accordingly referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOSÉ MARIA DE MARTINEZ.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the surveyor-general of Arizona on the private land claim of José Maria de Martinez; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SUMNER, of California, indefinitely.

To Mr. HOUK, for ten days, commencing April 10, on account of important private business.

To Mr. DARGAN, for ten days.

To Mr. STEPHENSON, until the 20th instant, on account of important business.

To Mr. CULLEN, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. CABELL, for four days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CULBERTSON, of Kentucky, until the 16th instant.

To Mr. MOULTON, until May 1, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. No business has been transacted by the House since the motion to adjourn was voted down.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Why, Mr. Speaker, executive communications have been referred to committees, and leave of absence has been granted in a number of cases. Certainly business has intervened since the vote upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. THOMPSON. It was by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair by unanimous consent laid before the House certain executive communications——

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. It was official business of the House.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman insists on his motion, the Chair supposes it is in order.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I see that there is a disposition on the part of the House to adjourn and I do not wish to antagonize it. Therefore, if there be no objection, I will withdraw my motion for a recess.

The SPEAKER. The motion for a recess is withdrawn. The question is on the motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should now adjourn, when we meet to-morrow will it be Friday or Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 11, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. F. D. POWER, D. D.

The Journal of Wednesday's proceedings was read and approved.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. ELLIS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back Senate bill 1871, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to offer a reward of $25,000 for rescuing or ascertaining the fate of the Greely expedition, and to ask unanimous consent for its consideration in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill, reserving the right to object.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make proclamation immediately, and cause said proclamation to be published and distributed as thoroughly as may be in such foreign ports as are interested in navigation and traffic in the Arctic seas, that the Government of the United States will pay a reward of $25,000, to be equitably paid or distributed to such ship or ships, person or persons, not in the military or naval service of the United States, as shall discover and rescue or satisfactorily ascertain the fate of the Greely expedition; but such proclamation shall not be made in terms that will involve the United States in any future liability or responsibility beyond said reward, or will induce unprepared vessels to incur extraordinary peril or risk; and the determination of the Secretary of the Navy as to the right of any man to said reward, or a share thereof, shall be conclusive upon all persons.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MILLS. Let us hear some explanation of the bill, reserving the right to object.

Mr. WELLER. I object.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to listen to me before he insists on his objection.

Mr. WELLER. I will wait for a moment before insisting on my objection.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, some years ago, I think in 1880, the Government of the United States sent Lieutenant Greely with an expedition to Lady Franklin Bay. He was sent by the United States Government, and I ask the gentleman to pay attention to what I am saying. It was a naval expedition, but officers and men, both of the Army and Navy, with the ships of the United States Navy, were sent under an act of Congress for scientific purposes. The expedition failed to return; it was arranged with Lieutenant Greely that efforts should be made for his relief in 1882 and 1883 if he did not return. Those expeditions were sent, but failed, on account of the unusual rigors of the northern winter, to reach him or communicate with him. They are our countrymen; they are officers and men of the United States Army and Navy, they are in charge of United States vessels, and they are, if alive, in extreme peril.

One of the expeditions which went out left stores, provisions, and clothing near the entrance of Smith's Sound, just at the entrance to Kane's Basin, about two hundred and twenty miles below the point to which Lieutenant Greely went in Lady Franklin Bay. The Government has organized under act of Congress another expedition for their relief. That expedition can not possibly depart on its merciful mission before the 1st or 10th of May next; before it can possibly reach the entrance of Smith's Sound where the supplies of stores and provisions were left the whalers and sealmen of the American and British merchant marine will be in all those waters; they understand the language of the natives, and under the stimulus of the proposed reward will make close search into all the inlets, bays, and islands of those wintry seas, and they may perhaps save the lives of the devoted men composing Greely's expedition by four or five or ten days; they may save the lives of these gallant officers and men of the United States Army and Navy sent there at the behest of this nation. They may save their lives by being eight or ten days sooner than the expedition possibly can be expected to reach there. If so, the object of the Greely relief expedition will be accomplished much sooner by some eight or ten months and the expedition will be enabled to return that much sooner to the United States at great economy, at a great saving of money, and the avoidance of further risk to ships and men. Every sentiment of duty, every throb of humanity to our imperiled countrymen prompts this bill should pass, and that the United States shall in its obligation to these men leave no stone unturned and no resources unexpended to rescue those men who by its behest were sent into their present position of peril. They went at our behest. Educated to obey—

> Theirs not to reason why—
> Theirs but to do and die—

they went to dare dangers, to encounter perils, to brave difficulties that we—some of whom here were once used to the horrors of war—can not adequately conceive; and having placed them in their awful position of peril, is it not our solemn and imperative duty to rescue and bring them home to their friends who grieve for them, and to their country to whose service they have dedicated their lives, and to this end to leave no expedient untried that shall accomplish this purpose? I hope and believe now that no gentleman will object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. WELLER. I wish to say in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana that we have already during this session made an unlimited appropriation to fit out cruisers for these waters for the relief of the Lady Franklin Bay expedition.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa insist on his objection?

Mr. WELLER. I desire to speak for a few moments in answer to the gentleman from Louisiana. I wish to give the reasons briefly why I refuse to yield unanimous consent to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for on both sides of the House, and if the gentleman insists on his objection the bill is not before the House.

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not understand that the gentleman from Iowa insists upon his objection.

The SPEAKER. He states that he does.

Mr. HAMMOND. I understand he is arguing the question as though the bill were under consideration.

The SPEAKER. But still he insists upon his objection.

Mr. WELLER. I wish to have an opportunity to make a statement of the ground of my objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his objection for that purpose?

Mr. WELLER. I withdraw it for the present in order that I may make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WELLER. Now, Mr. Speaker, there has been already an unlimited appropriation made by this House for the relief of the Lady Franklin Bay expedition or of the Greely party. I was at that time opposed to the granting of this unlimited appropriation, believing that there was a method that could be adopted by Congress which would be far preferable to that. In view of my opinions, I presented, many weeks ago, to the consideration of this House a bill asking for an appropriation of $100,000 for this very purpose. That bill was introduced by myself in this House and was referred to the proper committee. Subsequent to that time a bill was presented at the other end of the Capitol, in the Senate, touching this very question, and asking simply an appropriation of $25,000, which passed the Senate and came to the House and was referred to this same Committee on Appropriations. Now, the objection that I have made to this matter is made because I believe the work of this House has been ignored by the Appropriations Committee, and that they have paid special attention to the bill presented by the Senate instead. I am of the opinion that this House should see to it that it should have the preference in the consideration of its own bills over matters introduced by the Senate. I believe that the House should see to it that bills presented by its own members shall have priority of right before the Appropriations Committee, and should be considered in preference to bills from the other end of the Capitol, and not pigeon-holed or otherwise ignored.

Further, sir, my objection is that this same measure could have been passed by both Houses of Congress weeks ago if the Appropriations Committee had paid the attention to it that they have paid to the work of the Senate. I am in favor of granting the relief, but I do not believe that we should, on the one hand, grant an unlimited appropriation to buy ships, specially fit them out for the waters of the Arctic seas, and provide them with stores and send them on their mission, and then, on the other hand, make another appropriation in the way that this bill proposes to do. I believe that it is entirely unwarranted. I believe that it is ignoring the rights of this House in the premises in regard to this whole matter, and that this bill should come up in its proper order, and give the Appropriations Committee an opportunity, if they have not already availed themselves of it, to make a report upon the bill that had priority of right and that was called to their attention in due time and proper manner weeks before this bill saw the light of day. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. ELLIS. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this bill will pass immediately. I rise, however, for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the bill. I move that the sum fixed, $25,000, be stricken out and that $50,000 be inserted for the object contemplated by the bill.

Mr. WELLER. I move to amend the amendment by making it $100,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume the gentleman from Louisiana did not intend when he yielded the floor to permit amendments to be offered.

Mr. ELLIS. I did not yield the floor for amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. If there is objection I shall, of course, not attempt to make the motion. I hope, however, the gentleman from Louisiana will not object to an amendment.

Mr. ELLIS. I cannot yield for an amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I shall not, then, persevere in the attempt to offer one.

Allow me to say in the moment or two which the gentleman has been kind enough to yield to me, that I trust there will be no opposition to the passage of this bill, insignificant as is the sum which it proposes to appropriate, and notwithstanding my fears that it will be a total failure in the end. We should have at least $100,000 appropriated for this purpose. We have already paid $100,000 for one ship, and for another ship we have paid about the same sum, and in addition to that we have gone down on our knees to a foreign nation, begging another from them which in the end will avail nothing for the rescue of the gallant officers and crew of that ill-fated expedition.

Offers were made, as gentlemen around me are well aware, to build ships which would have been superior in all respects to those which we have begged from a foreign nation and those which we have bought, which would have been ready for the service on which they were to be sent by the first of this month, more than ten days ago, which would have given an opportunity to American ship-builders and shipyards to build the ships of our own material. Had this option been given to them they would have been ready, as I have said, to have furnished these ships to the Department by the first day of this month. But that opportunity was never granted to them, and now it is too late to complain.

I can only repeat the wish, sir, that this appropriation was $100,000. I wanted it $50,000 at least, which was the amendment I had desired to offer, and though the gentleman from Louisiana would not yield for that purpose, I heartily support him in urging the immediate passage of this bill.

Mr. WELLER. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana if he will yield to me to allow an amendment increasing this appropriation to $100,000?

Mr. ELLIS. I can not, and I will state very briefly the reasons. In the first place, I have no right under the instructions I have from the Committee on Appropriations to open up this bill to amendment. In the second place, the Senate believe, and the Committee on Appropriations also believe, that if a large amount like $100,000 was offered as a reward it would be, perhaps, a stimulus to many persons to risk their lives and their vessels in the search, and we would probably have to send relief for somebody else before the purpose of the expedition has been accomplished. I think, therefore, the original reward contemplated, the comparatively small sum of $25,000, would be sufficient to stimulate the whalers to make careful survey and search of all the bays, inlets, and islands in those regions, and, if successful in their search, will arrest the progress of our relief expedition at the entrance of Smith's Sound and send it back home.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ELLIS. I will hear it.

Mr. WELLER. Does the gentleman regard the interests at stake as being just simply of the importance of $25,000? Or would he regard the interests at stake as of the importance of $100,000?

Mr. ELLIS. Sir, the lives of those gallant soldiers and sailors can not be estimated in dollars and cents.

Mr. WELLER. Then permit me to inquire why not offer $100,000 reward at this time, being an amount that would be somewhat commensurate with the interests at stake, and run the risk of the judgment of the men who undertake the enterprise to navigate those waters and make that search for relief in the matter of the dangers involved?

Mr. ELLIS. Because we believe it would unduly stimulate men to run into peril.

Mr. HAMMOND. In other words, because you think $25,000 enough.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. When the earthly life of my friend from Iowa shall have ended and he shall have floated into the fields of illimitable and immeasurable space I give a guarantee that I will erect a monument to him, and the first line on it will be, "I object;" and below that I will have engraved on that monument a precise and absolute copy of the damnable rules of this House. [Laughter.] I think the rules and the gentleman from Iowa will go fitly together and float down the stream of eternity forever and forever. [Renewed laughter.] Here is a bill passed by the Senate, recommended by a Democratic committee, reported to this House, and antagonized by the luminous and elaborate gentleman from the State of Iowa, who must have started his craze on the greenback question and the Lord knows where it will end. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] has the floor, having made the report, and is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. ELLIS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WELLER. I trust the gentleman will yield to me a minute or two.

Mr. ELLIS. I withhold the demand for the previous question and yield the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] one minute.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. WELLER. I apprehend it is in regular order for me to pay briefly my attention to the distinguished gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. You can go at it whenever you get ready.

Mr. WELLER. I have been an admirer of the brilliant remarks that the gentleman from Colorado so frequently, in order and out of order, makes on this floor. But that which I admire more than the brilliancy of his remarks is the indescribable brilliancy of his countenance. [Laughter.] I am surprised, however, that the gentleman (who boasts that he is a stalwart member of the Republican party) should have a face brilliant in such shades of colors as to indicate so plainly as his countenance does the indices that he, if Republican proclamations on that point are reliable, belongs to another party and is on the wrong side of this House. [Laughter.] I trust, Mr. Speaker, that I may, when I enter the realms of eternity, float on and forever in that paradise of my eternal hope as a just and proper reward for daring to do right. But I guarantee when I do I will be found floating in a contrary direction from that which the gentleman from Colorado must inevitably take unless he reforms in very many particulars, and that speedily. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELFORD. I will be going to heaven and you will be going the other way. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] has expired.

Mr. ELLIS. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BEACH. I object.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] will withdraw his objection, at least until I make a statement.

Mr. BEACH. I shall not withdraw the objection. I would not have made it if I had intended to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. That motion requires a two-thirds vote.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HANCOCK, there were—ayes 68, noes 50.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN and others called for the regular order.

CHARGES AGAINST H. V. BOYNTON.

Mr. HOPKINS. I rise to a question of privilege. I call up the report of the select committee to investigate charges against H. V. Boynton. I have the authority of the committee to say that they desire no discussion so far as they are concerned, and unless the resolution shall be debated or some one shall desire to speak in opposition to it I shall call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up as a matter of privilege the report of the select committee on charges against H. V. Boynton. The resolution will be read.

Whereas Howard University, a national institution, in the District of Columbia, has recently commenced the experiment of an industrial department in connection with their academic course with great promise of success: Therefore,

Resolved, That in order that an industrial department may be maintained at said university the Committee on Education respectfully recommends to the Committee on Appropriations an appropriation for the salaries of a superintendent and five instructors in the several mechanic arts in the industrial department of said institution to the amount of $3,700.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move to dispense with the further consideration of private business in order to take up for action the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to state, in view of the fact that the House is much behind with the appropriation business and as the Committee on Appropriations has a bill ready for action in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I will make no effort to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, in order that the House may go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and proceed to the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. KEIFER. As it is, I do not believe it is necessary to move to dispense with the private business in order to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Of course the question will be put on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider appropriation bills, in reference to which a majority has control.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry: Would a call for the regular order of business, which would be the consideration of the business on the Private Calendar, take precedence? That is, if regular order were demanded and a motion made to go to the business on the Private Calendar, would not that motion take precedence of the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], chairman of the Committee on Claims, to say that he did not propose to antagonize the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider appropriation bills.

Mr. HANCOCK's motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The first bill on the Calendar making appropriations is the bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I move that the first formal reading of the bill for information by unanimous consent be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is now before the committee, to be considered by paragraphs, and the Clerk will read the first paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, namely:

For Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, and survivors and widows of the war of 1812, $20,000,000; and any balance of the appropriation for the above purposes for the current fiscal year that may remain unexpended on the 30th of June, 1884, is hereby reappropriated and made available for the service of the year ending June 30, 1885: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose: And provided further, That the amount expended under each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Were points of order reserved on this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands they were not, and it is now too late.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I have but a few remarks to make on this bill making appropriations to pay our pensions for the next fiscal year. The total sum for that purpose proposed to be appropriated by the bill is $86,684,400. It seems to be sufficient, and it is expected a surplus will be left after all the pensions have been paid.

The appropriations for the current fiscal year, 1884, aggregate in round numbers the sum of $126,000,000; of that amount there was expended during the first six months, ending December 31, 1883, $25,673,000. Estimating that the total expenditures for the fiscal year will aggregate $60,000,000, it will be seen that an unexpended balance of the appropriations for the year of $66,000,000 will remain.

The bill reported herewith makes an appropriation of $20,684,400 for the service of the year 1885, together with all unexpended balances of the appropriations for the year 1884, which are estimated, as above, to be $66,000,000, making the aggregate amount appropriated by the bill for the fiscal year 1885 $86,684,400.

The bill further appropriates $684,400 for miscellaneous items and contingent expenses, as fuel, postage, &c. This portion of the bill I presume will excite no opposition and likely no amount of discussion. But, Mr. Chairman, there may be difference of opinion as to the second paragraph of the bill. It proposes new legislation, and changes the number of pension agents from eighteen to twelve, and reduces the pay allowed for preparing pension vouchers from 15 cents to 5 cents for each voucher in a pension case.

The reduction of the agents from the present number, eighteen, to twelve I understand is acceptable to the Commissioner of Pensions, he believing that number will be sufficient to do the work, and certainly more economically than the eighteen, and it is believed that the work will be performed just as satisfactorily as now. A strong disposition was manifested to dispense with these agents entirely, and return the whole business of paying the pensioners to the Treasury Department, where it probably rightfully belongs, and where it might be more economically performed than by the present system. But there was a disinclination on the part of some to make that change, and it was insisted that as the pensioners themselves in many instances have become familiar with this mode of payment they ought to be deferred to so far as continuing the present system is concerned, although it is not questioned that it will cost probably $150,000 more to pay them in the present manner than if they were paid directly through the Treasury Department.

The other clause of this second section, reducing the compensation allowed to the pension agents from 15 cents to 5 cents for each voucher prepared by them, will doubtless be objected to as reducing the compensation of the pension agents more than it ought to be reduced. I conceive there can be no question, Mr. Chairman, that the pension agents will be still abundantly paid for the amount of labor they are required to perform in the preparation of the vouchers. Heretofore I think it is safe to say that with the exception of but very few officers of the Government they have been paid larger sums by way of salary and compensation in proportion to the amount of labor than almost any of the other employés of the Government. Each agent received as a salary the sum of $4,000 a year for his services and for the preparation, you may say, of vouchers for 1,000 pensioners four times a year; that is to say, 4,000 vouchers during the year. He has no compensation for that number of vouchers excepting the salary; but heretofore he has received 15 cents for each voucher in excess of that number, which it is now proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to reduce to 5 cents.

To estimate what would be fair and reasonable in this respect we have called to our assistance persons supposed to be better able to determine the amount that could be realized by the pension agents than probably the members of the committee or others connected with this body. We find that the voucher is made up in the form of this paper which I hold in my hand, and gentlemen can see here the amount of writing that is necessarily done by the clerk or the agent himself to fill it up. It will be seen that he must only fill in the blank space in these receipts; and then on the back of it indorse upon it the name and number, to indicate what particular voucher it is. It is estimated that a fair, active penman will write without difficulty as much as eighty pages of foolscap manuscript in a day. There is not probably in amount one-tenth, perhaps not more than one-twelfth, of the labor required to write one page of foolscap necessary to fill up one of these vouchers. In addition to that, however——

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HANCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I would like to ask the gentleman if a great deal of labor necessarily performed in making up these vouchers is not in looking up the record in each case?

Mr. HANCOCK. I was just coming to that point. The mere clerical labor, the filling up of the blank places on this printed form, is not all of the labor that is necessary to be done by the agent, because if it were 5 cents for each one would be an excessive compensation. But of course they are required also to look upon the list in order to get the proper name and probably the proper amount and perchance also the proper address of the party, which, however, can not take a very great length of time or involve much labor, as the lists of the pensioners are all furnished to the agent by the Pension Bureau, and it is only a mere matter of looking over the list and ascertaining the particular facts in reference to the case in order to fill up the voucher. The voucher, however, you will remember, is not entirely filled up until it has been sent first to the party and this portion of it which relates to the magistrate's certificate has been filled up and returned.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the gentleman another question? He says that the voucher is partly filled up before it comes into the hands of the agent.

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. And it is finished afterward by the agent?

Mr. HANCOCK. They are partly filled up before they are sent to the pensioner, and afterward when they come back the draft is sent to the party, which is an additional service rendered by the agent besides filling up the voucher. He has simply to fill up the amount in the voucher and remit the draft to the party. This payment I understand to be made upon the draft of the pensioner himself. With all of the amount of clerical labor which is required in filling up the voucher and of making the payment, it is believed that without difficulty one hundred vouchers could easily be completed in a day. Now, this printed form, the voucher, is printed without expense to the agent. All that he has to do is simply to fill it up. An ordinarily expert penman would, as I am informed, readily complete one hundred of them in a day and require no great amount of skill, which would be equal, at the rate proposed here, to a salary of $5 a day for all the labor involved. That seems to the committee to be a sufficient sum to engage the service of men eminently qualified to perform that particular duty. Indeed, I think it is such a sum for each of these vouchers in addition to the compensation which the agent receives in the first instance, and whose time certainly is not required to be actively and closely engaged for the whole year, as will secure efficient service. Getting as he does $4,000 a year, with all of his rent paid, his light and fuel furnished, and even the postage paid by the Government, it is believed that the sum ought to be and will be a sufficient compensation to secure for this service, which I regard as one that should be done efficiently and expeditiously, the best character of business talent in the country disposed to take hold of this character of occupation.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HANCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. MILLARD. Does the pension agent out of this $4,000 pay his clerks?

Mr. HANCOCK. He is not supposed to pay his clerks out of the $4,000. The fee of 5 cents on each voucher is supposed to be sufficient to pay the clerks. For the $4,000 he has to fill up 4,000 vouchers. For all over that he is paid 5 cents on each.

There is another matter of new legislation which I do not propose to particularly advocate. It is that which fixes the compensation of pension lawyers at $10. It seems to be a sort of inexorable rule that the lawyer shall in no instance receive more than $10 for his services in and about securing pensions, arrears of pay, bounty lands, &c., and only in such cases as may be successful. We find from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions that about 60 per cent. of the applications for pensions succeed, so that the average fee of the lawyer would be reduced to $6. I can not say whether that is right or not. I must confess in frankness I very much doubt it. I think the compensation is inadequate. But it was insisted by a member of the committee far more familiar with these duties than I am that about all that the pension attorneys about the capital did was to receive the papers from the attorneys in the neighborhood where the pensioner resided and present them. If that be true, probably an average of $6—for that would be what he would get—would compensate a person competent to present the papers. But if he has to perform professional labor, requiring learning in the particular duty that he undertakes to discharge, I submit to the committee whether this is a wise provision.

It has been suggested, and I think with a good deal of force, that probably pensioners and other like claimants might as well be left to the exercise of their own best discretion on this subject, rather than trammel them by requiring them to depend upon the services of attorneys who receive but a contingent fee, and that an exceedingly small one.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Texas permit me to interrupt him at this point?

Mr. HANCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I want to say at this point very briefly this: The Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay have had under consideration for the past six weeks or two months two subjects. One was with reference to the rules of practice in the Pension Department and the other was with reference to the compensation of the attorneys. We have given that subject careful and long consideration, aided by the ablest counsel engaged in that practice in the city and aided meeting after meeting, for week after week by the Commissioner of Pensions himself, who has given us the result of his experience as Pension Commissioner upon this subject. We have also looked up the history of the law upon the subject, and have found the defects under the one system and under the other and the merits under the one system and under the other, and to-morrow was the day set apart for perfecting the bill for that purpose. I think the Committee on Appropriations ought to consent to have this provision of the bill stricken out, and the House should have the benefit of the bill which the committee specially delegated to consider the question have matured for that purpose.

I make this suggestion thus early that the gentleman from Texas may have the opportunity of consulting with his colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations as to the advantage of our giving the House the benefit of the investigations we have made upon this subject. And I give notice also that at the proper time I shall move to strike out that section of the bill.

Mr. BUDD. I believe the point of order that the section changes existing law would be against it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In addition to what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] has said, I wish to say that the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Bay undoubtedly will be prepared to report to-morrow, after one more session, a bill upon which a great deal of labor has been expended. I may add also that it is the judgment of the committee that this provision of the bill, section 2 as it stands here, while a part of what it aims at is right, as a whole should not remain in the bill.

Mr. HANCOCK. I think I can reply to both of the honorable gentlemen that I have not urged this feature of the bill very affirmatively.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I observed that.

Mr. HANCOCK. I am not responsible for it. But I wish my colleague on the committee, Judge HOLMAN, to have an opportunity to vindicate his view. He is far more familiar with the subject than I am, and has a knowledge of the facts which are not familiar to me.

We down in my section of the country are not much favored with pensions. I think there are but one or two in all my section of country. I think a few others have made application, but have been denied on some immaterial, unimportant ground—some incident that might perhaps be better forgotten than recollected. [Laughter.] So this is a new subject with us, and I am not prepared to say what is the right thing to do. But I am gratified to hear it is a subject which has engaged the special attention of I think the appropriate committee to consider it.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I throw out this suggestion more for the purpose of getting information and the views of the committee on the point than for any purpose of criticising their report or their action. But it seems to me it is a proper question to come before this committee in some form or other, and I would like to ask this: Is it not a fact that your investigations show that reducing the compensation of pension attorneys to a very small amount results in the employment of very small, very cheap, very dishonest attorneys, and they in fact do the soldiers more harm than they do them good? And would it not be wise to strike out all restrictions on their fees and leave that to be a mere matter of agreement between the soldier and his attorney; so that he can employ a good man and pay him what his services are honestly worth, and thereby secure the services of good, honorable men?

Mr. HANCOCK. I can not answer the gentleman's question, except that I can say in vindication of my profession that our investigations have not led to the development of anything like dishonesty on the part of lawyers; they are generally found to be correct. If you will give them fair compensation I think it very likely that you will get efficient work. Sometimes by not giving adequate compensation you do not get the right kind of lawyers; and that often leads to litigation and expenses to an extent that is not necessary.

I will not occupy more of my time at present, but will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I will take ten minutes; I may possibly want a little more.

Mr. HANCOCK. I will yield to the gentleman for ten minutes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] in charge of this bill has stated the amount that it carries. The bill really carries, as he well stated, the amount in round numbers of $86,684,000, although it only purports to carry specifically on its face $20,000,000. It is estimated by the committee, and by the estimate clerk of the Treasury Department, that there will be at the end of the current year an unexpended balance of the appropriations heretofore made for pensions of $66,000,000. The appropriations and reappropriations made by the last Congress for this year amounted to $126,000,000. It is estimated that $60,000,000 will be the amount expended this year, leaving $66,000,000 unexpended. This bill reappropriates that $66,000,000 and adds $20,000,000 to that amount.

Mr. HISCOCK. May I ask the gentleman now on the floor why that is done, why the money necessary for the next year is not directly appropriated, and the unexpended balances of appropriations for two or three years past returned to the Treasury?

Mr. CANNON. I suppose it is a mere matter of dress-parade; that is all. In other words, it will enable some of our Democratic friends when they go before the people during the next campaign to get on the stump and say, "We have cut down the appropriations so much." Now, here is a big item of $66,000,000 which they need not count, provided they are not good book-keepers. That might fool somebody; but yet when you take the next clause of the bill reappropriating the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the current year, which substantially amounts to $66,000,000, the whole appropriation by this bill is really $86,000,000. It, therefore, does not amount to anything; it will not deceive sensible people, and as to those who want to be deceived by it, it is not worth while to take the trouble to explain the matter further.

Mr. COBB. Allow me to ask you a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. COBB. How can you make a reappropriation without putting it iin the bill?

Mr. CANNON. You can not do so.

Mr. COBB. How then about the pretense that the appropriation is not made?

Mr. CANNON. If you do not reappropriate this $66,000,000 it will go back into the Treasury.

Mr. COBB. I understand that perfectly well.

Mr. CANNON. Let me answer your question; I have but ten minutes' time. If you do not reappropriate the unexpended balance it will go back into the Treasury and then you would have to appropriate $86,000,000 specifically. As the bill is it appropriates $20,000,000 specifically and reappropriates the unexpended balance heretofore appropriated without mentioning the amount.

Mr. COBB. How, then, is it a political trick, as the gentleman would make the House believe?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] asked why we did this.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is the right way.

Mr. HORR. It is the right way.

Mr. CANNON. Who is making this speech, I would like to know? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed without being interrupted.

Mr. COBB. I would like to ask the gentleman a further question, if he will allow me.

Mr. CANNON. I will not allow the gentleman to ask a further question until I have answered the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and the one already asked by my friend from Indiana [Mr. COBB]. When I have done so, if I have not then covered the whole ground, I will yield for a further question.

I say in answer to my friends from New York and Indiana that so far as the Treasury is concerned it does not make any difference whether this bill formally appropriates $86,000,000 or whether it formally appropriates $20,000,000 and reappropriates the unexpended balance for the current year, which it is estimated will amount to $66,000,000.

Mr. COBB. Now let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. CANNON. Certainly, if my time can be extended. I want to talk a little about the material matters in the bill.

Mr. COBB. Is not this bill in strict conformity with the action of ing last House of Representatives on this subject? Are we not follow-the in the same line?

Mr. CANNON. In one instance I will say that during the short session of the last Congress the House of Representatives did make a reappropriation of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for pensions, if that will satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. COBB. Then there is no political trick about it.

Mr. CANNON. I said that my friend from Indiana could go upon the stump during the next campaign and claim that his party had reduced the appropriations, and not take into account this $66,000,000 reappropriated, although it is in fact covered by this bill. And I suspect that my friend from Indiana [Mr. COBB] will do so. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. How can you make a reappropriation and prevent the people from knowing it?

Mr. CANNON. You can appropriate $86,000,000 pure and simple upon the face of the bill, and the bill would bear exactly the same amount of money as it would if you appropriate only $20,000,000 directly and reappropriate the unexpended balance heretofore made by a Republican Congress.

Mr. HORR. It was wrong last year, and it is wrong this.

Mr. CANNON. I hope I will be permitted to answer the questions of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] without interruption.

Mr. COBB. I have no further questions to propound.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman is correct in that last statement. [Laughter.] So much for this appropriation. I did not intend to occupy more than a minute upon it.

Now, there is a clause in this bill to which I am opposed. In the first place I will say that section 2, touching the fees of attorneys, I am inclined to think is not properly matured, and I am gratified to know that the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, at the head of which is my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], has given weeks of consideration to this subject and is ready to-morrow, under a special order, to take it up and exhaust it. I think the bare statement of this fact ought to be sufficient to secure the exclusion of the section from this bill.

Now, I wish to call attention to a part of section 1, commencing with line 23, on the second page, and ending with line 41, on the third page. This provision I do not approve of. It provides in brief for consolidating the eighteen pension agencies into twelve; and it provides further for cutting down the fees of the pension agents upon vouchers from 15 cents, the present rate, to 5 cents, a reduction of two-thirds. I do not think the legislation embraced in this provision is wise, and I undertake to say if it be enacted into law the pensioners will not be paid any money in the next fiscal year. I think if the House comes to understand that fact this proposed legislation will not be adopted.

I am frank to say, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, that when this bill was adopted in committee I did not find any one who had sufficient knowledge touching the compensation of these agents and their expenses to give me any light upon the question. I was not upon the subcommittee, and I reserved the right, as my colleagues on the committee will recollect, to investigate this matter and act upon my judgment after investigation. I have given the subject as thorough investigation as was possible for me to give it at the Pension Office, and I oppose this feature of the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HANCOCK. I yield the gentleman ten minutes more of my time.

Mr. CANNON. This item, it will be observed, carries an appropriation of $174,400:

> For pay and allowances of pension agents: For salary, fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel, lights, and postage on letters to the Executive Departments and to pensioners, $174,400.

It will be observed that this covers the entire amount of the salaries, including fees on vouchers, all the expenses for every purpose of paying pensioners. The present salary of these pension agents is $4,000 a year. In addition to this, they receive 15 cents on each voucher upon which they make payment. The former pay was 30 cents for each voucher. It has been cut down during the last eight years one-half. It was first reduced to 25 cents for each voucher, and later to 15 cents. There is no payment whatever of fees upon these vouchers, except for vouchers in excess of 4,000. Out of the salary of $4,000 and the fees upon vouchers the pension agent has to pay his clerk-hire; he has to pay for his office furniture where he is not in a public building, and also many incidental expenses, such as ice, stationery, &c.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. How many of these officers are in Government buildings?

Mr. CANNON. There are seven of these offices in public buildings. Besides all this, the pension agent pays without any reimbursement all his postage other than the postage upon the correspondence with the Department and with pensioners. Now, a great many letters are written to these pension agents by attorneys and friends of pensioners; a great many letters are written all over the country making inquiries, and it is courteous and proper that the pension agent should answer.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does he pay the postage in such cases?

Mr. CANNON. He does. All that comes out of his salary; and as I have said, where he is not in a public building he furnishes the office fixtures and all other conveniences at his own expense, and only seven of these eighteen agents have their offices in Government buildings.

Upon inquiry at the Pension Office I find that in 1881 the Commissioner of Pensions had reports from fifteen of the seventeen pension agents then in office. These reports, when consolidated, show that for every 2,500 pensioners paid it was necessary for the pension agent to employ one clerk for the whole year; and it must be borne in mind that these clerks are paid by the agent; and besides the permanent clerks, the agents are obliged to employ temporary clerks on an average of eight days every quarter.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. From that time on is not the pension agent practically a gentleman of leisure?

Mr. CANNON. By no manner of means. The same report of 1881 shows that for each 16,600 pensioners paid eight temporary clerks were employed on an average of eight days during each quarter, in addition to the permanent clerks. I have given the facts, and will state the account upon these facts as to receipts and expenditures of agents.

On the 1st of July next it is estimated there will be 325,000 pensioners on the pension-roll, which in round numbers would give 27,000 pensioners to be paid by each one of the twelve pension agents proposed by this bill. Now you pay them four times a year, which would make 108,000 vouchers. Many of these pensioners let their pensions accumulate; that is they do not ask payment every quarter where the pensions are small. It is ascertained that 6.4 per cent. are not paid quarterly. It is cut down, therefore, from 108,000 by this 6.4 per cent. on account of those pensioners who aggregate their pension payments.

Now, if you deduct the 4,000 vouchers which pay nothing to the agent, and deduct that from the 108,000, after you have deducted the 6.4 per cent. you will find it leaves 96,338 payments on vouchers annually. On an average each one of these agents would get 5 cents instead of 15, which would make $4,839. The salary is $4,000. Add the two together, and that is the total compensation of each one of these pension agents, namely, $8,839.

Now let us take the expenditure on the part of each one of these pension agents. The aggregate of receipts, as I have shown, for each pension agent is $8,839. By these reports, as we have seen, there are eleven permanent clerks at $736 per annum each, and that is little enough for a permanent clerk. The permanent clerks, therefore, cost $8,096, to be paid at each pension agency. Thirteen temporary clerks employed at each agency during each quarter on an average of eight days at $2 a day for each—and that is little enough to pay—would give us $832. Add the printing and stationery which each agent furnishes at his own expense, $600.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Does not the Government furnish that?

Mr. CANNON. No; the Government does not furnish the printing and stationery.

Now, how do we find the account to stand? We find that each pension agent receives as total compensation $8,839, that his expenditures amount to $9,528. In other words, it would take all of his salary and all the fees upon vouchers, at 5 cents a voucher, to pay the expenses, and $689 in addition per annum.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Has the gentleman heard of any one of these pension agents resigning?

Mr. CANNON. No, and for the reason that the agents now receive not over $4,000 per annum under existing law, but if you require them to do this work for nothing, as this bill proposes, no one would do the service. Even my philanthropic friend from Kentucky, who like myself is not a capitalist, would not do it.

These facts are from the report of these agents made to the Commissioner of Pensions in 1881.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman from Texas will allow me a few minutes longer, in order that I may conclude what I have to say as to this matter.

Mr. HANCOCK. How long does the gentleman wish?

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad if the gentleman would allow me to proceed, and whatever time I occupy I will return to him when I am recognized in my own right. As I have begun the statement of this matter I should like to be allowed to continue until I have finished it.

Mr. HANCOCK. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, at my request the Commissioner of Pensions communicated with the several pension agents and asked them to make a full and frank statement in reference to their receipts and expenditures. Returns were made by sixteen of the eighteen pension agents. The returns cover six months of time in 1883–'84, and for these six months the salaries of the sixteen agents were $32,000; fees on vouchers, at 15 cents per voucher, the present law, $74,488; making a total of $106,388. The expenses amounted to $58,825; or, in other words, deducting the expenditures, there was left $47,963, net compensation for sixteen agents.

Now, I will from these facts state the result at 5 cents a voucher, as proposed by the bill, for six months:

|---|---|
| Receipts by agents: | |
| Six months' salary for sixteen agents | $32,000 |
| For fees on vouchers, at 5 cents per voucher | 24,796 |
| Total | 56,796 |
| Expenditures of agents: | |
| Paid for clerical help (the permanent force being 119 clerks) | 53,170 |
| Stationery and printing | 2,755 |
| Office expenses (estimated) | 2,500 |
| Total | 58,425 |

which would take all the salary and fees of pension agents and $1,629 besides for six months.

My friends around me say that they do not understand the basis of this calculation. For their information I will repeat that the statement I have made is on the basis of 5 cents for each voucher.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Do not the pension agents make that statement themselves?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; and therefore it is all the more valuable. And if my friend from Kentucky is the champion of this measure without investigation, I submit to him, and I say it with all due respect, that I think the Committee on Appropriations also reported without investigation, and as I am on the committee I have the right to abuse myself. I do not think that there has been any accurate investigation whatever made by the committee. Now, I call the attention of the House to the fact that here is a statement made in 1881, when this question was not mooted at all, when there was no question of cutting the vouchers, and here is another statement made in 1883–'84, both of which substantially agree as to the facts. And you can not cut these expenses down any less than they are now, for the reason that the pension agent pays the same out of his own pocket and it is his interest of course that he should get people to do all of this work at the lowest possible price.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Do I understand you to say that the pension agents hire all of the clerical force to which you have referred for the entire year?

Mr. CANNON. I understand——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman know that the whole business is disposed of in a few days four times a year?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, in answer to my friend from Kentucky I have to say——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And the gentleman should remember that the agent's salary is quite large in the first instance.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Kentucky will permit me to answer his question, I will endeavor to do so. I will say to the gentleman that the positions of the agents are responsible ones. They have to give bonds and their work runs the whole year round, and it is found necessary, as shown by their returns, that they shall have one permanent clerk the whole year round for every 2,600 pensioners that they pay. Why, does my friend from Kentucky think that the only duty of the pension agents is to furnish the check and transmit it to the pensioners?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That is the perquisite rather than the salary——

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend suppose that the first eight days in each quarter in which he makes these payments ends the duties of the agent for the entire quarter? Does he not know that there are other and manifold duties to be performed? Does he not know that there are to be returns made to the Auditor? Does he not know that the accounts have to be made up; that the whole of the papers have to be gone over by careful comparison with the roll? That after the report is forwarded to the Auditor there is necessarily a great deal of correspondence about it; that it has to pass the Comptroller? Does my friend understand the system of settlement of these accounts?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman if he does not think that this whole system of paying pensions could be done at the Treasury Department at a great deal less expense than through these agents?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I am consuming the time of the gentleman from Texas, and if he will allow me to cover the time I will give him my time, when I take the floor in return.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Texas to yield a limited time.

Mr. HANCOCK. I will yield the gentleman five minutes more if he desires it.

Mr. CANNON. I will take the floor in my own right, and if the gentleman will yield to me now all of the time to complete my statement I will return it to him.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. HANCOCK. Until he stops or exhausts all my time.

Mr. CANNON. I thank the gentleman.

Now, my friend from Kentucky asks a question that I do not care to discuss at this time, whether payments could not be made at the Treasury Department. I will answer him, yes, they could; but will state after investigation that the expense of payment would be greater than under the present system. It is but fair that I should call the attention of the House to the fact that under the present law the average net compensation of these sixteen agents for the last six months was at the rate of $5,995 per annum.

Mr. ROSECRANS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I understood you to say that there are some 325,000 pensioners or thereabouts.

Mr. CANNON. Three hundred and twenty-five thousand.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Allowing, then, four vouchers for each pensioner, that makes 1,300,000 vouchers. Allowing twelve pension agents, then there would be 48,000 vouchers that would not be paid for at all. That deducted from the 1,300,000 vouchers you will have 1,252,000 vouchers.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose the gentleman has made the computation.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Now, paying for preparing these vouchers and attending to the business in connection with them at the rate of $5 per hundred gives $64,600, which, divided among the twelve agents, would be an average of $5,380 for each. I want to ask the gentleman if in view of the amount of work performed he does not regard that as excessive?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend from California that I made the calculation which I announced to the House some time ago. I have not time to stop and verify the gentleman's calculation. One thing he has not taken into account is that 6.4 per cent. of these vouchers should be deducted on account of payments made less frequent than quarterly. My friend asked, "Is not that excessive?" I will say, on the contrary, it is not sufficient to pay the expenses of payment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then the gentleman from Illinois admits that practically these agents get $6,000 a year now, being $1,000 more than a member of Congress receives who works during the whole year, while these agents are only employed during part of the year.

Mr. CANNON. As I go along stating the facts, before I have stated the whole of them or drawn the conclusion from them the gentleman from Kentucky springs up without addressing the Chair or asking my permission, and seizes upon one fact after I have told it in order that he may dovetail it in with his own speech. I will say to the gentleman that it would be better if he would let me state the whole case before in his inordinate zeal he rushes in when it is only half told. I state to the House very frankly that according to these last reports if the fee for the vouchers remains at 15 cents, as at present, that would give the agents $5,995 per annum.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That is, $6,000.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; any fool would know that without my friend's stating it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Provided he is from Wabash.

Mr. CANNON. My friend from Kentucky is always witty, but I would rather he was witty in his own time.

Now, if it is the sense of this committee to cut that compensation down, all right. If it is the sense of the committee to cut it down so that the agents shall get just $4,000 a year after they have paid the expenses, all right; cut it down. But there is no sense in cutting it down so that they will not get anything and will have to pay from their private funds to carry on the office.

I might say, if I was ungenerous, that this is a scheme to defeat the payment of pensions. I do not think anybody on either side of the House wants to do that. But I say it is a scheme which is brought into this House without investigation and without proper knowledge, the effect of which will be, if it be written in the law, to defeat the payment of pensions.

Now, gentlemen ought to recollect another thing which is not taken into account here, that every one of these agents is responsible if he pays money on a false voucher or by mistake. And, however careful agents may be, false vouchers are presented and paid every year to the amount of hundreds of dollars, and in every instance the agent must make up the amount from his private funds.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that it costs to disburse money through the paymasters of the Army $23 per $1,000, and much is said as to the efficiency and economy of the Army, while it only costs to pay the pensioners, much greater in number than the Army, $4.76 per $1,000.

I undertake to say that never in the history of this country was money disbursed so rapidly, so satisfactorily, so economically as it is disbursed through these pension agencies. And I say, after investigation, it is not even disbursed through the Treasury Department here at Washington in payment of the public debt as cheaply, everything taken into account, as it is by these pension agents. Now, I think gentlemen will hesitate long before they will undertake without investigation to change this system.

There are only eighteen of these agents for the whole United States. The system is working admirably. I think it ought to be let alone. If it be the sense of the House that the fee should be cut down to 12 cents a voucher, or to bring down the salary of the agent substantially to $4,000, very well, so be it. But I think the House should inquire fully before they even do that, especially when they consider the amount disbursed and the responsibility of the position.

I thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] for having yielded me his time.

Mr. HANCOCK. I will take but a moment. I have here a very interesting table showing the amounts appropriated for the pension-list from 1861 to 1885 inclusive. It is carefully made out, but is not in print anywhere that I could find. When I was making the few remarks I did upon this bill I did not have it before me. I now ask that it may be printed in the RECORD for the use of members.

There was no objection. The table is as follows:

Army and Navy pensions.

a Indefinite. b This period includes the investment of $13,000,000 of the Navy pension fund.

Mr. HANCOCK. I will reserve the remainder of my time in case I desire to say anything further.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of entering upon any general discussion of this appropriation bill. My own impressions, gathered from all the statistics which I have been able to look at and from all the information we have been able to obtain in the Committee on Appropriations, is that there will be no difficulty as to the amount appropriated by this bill. In other words, $86,000,000 will be all that will be required to pay the pensions for the next fiscal year.

Some criticism may be made upon the manner of making this appropriation, and possibly such criticism may be just as applied generally to making appropriations. While this bill appropriates directly but $20,000,000, it may be fairly said that it contains direct appropriations to the amount of $86,000,000. I admit that the amount, $66,000,000, is to some extent an estimate of what will be the surplus of appropriations over and above the amount necessary to be used in the payment of pensions for the current fiscal year. But it is probable that the appropriations made by this bill will amount to $86,000,000; that is, the direct appropriation is $20,000,000 and the unexpended balance for the current fiscal year which is reappropriated will amount to $66,000,000.

It is very probable that each appropriation bill should name the sum carried by it for the year for which the appropriation is made, and that all unexpended balances of appropriations should be covered into the Treasury under existing law. But whatever may be the proper policy in that regard, I am not criticising this bill for inadequacy of appropriation. I will therefore proceed now to consider the particular provisions of the bill to which there is objection.

The first to which objection is made, and upon which I shall spend very little time, is the proposition to pay to pension agents $5 for each one hundred vouchers, or in that proportion, paid by any agent in excess of 4,000 vouchers per annum.

Mr. LONG. What is paid now?

Mr. KEIFER. Under existing law the agents are now paid $15 per hundred in excess of 4,000 vouchers per annum, instead of $5 as proposed by this bill. I have not in such tangible form that I can use them the statistics to demonstrate what is claimed by those who have examined this question fully; that is, that if we reduce the rate of payment from $15 to $5 for each hundred vouchers we shall practically wipe out all the salaries of most of the pension agents. I have seen statements that would show that in some instances the salaries would not be sufficient to pay the clerks and run the office, leaving the agent without any pay at all for his services.

The pension agent for the State of Ohio, a careful, prudent man, who works by day and by night, informs me that upon a careful estimate he could probably run his office, if this change is made, by devoting to it his salary and hiring persons at a low rate of compensation, and not claiming one cent of compensation for his own services. I am informed that the agent at Knoxville, Tenn., who pays the pensions of nine States, finds upon a calculation carefully made that with his salary added to the fees provided by this bill it would be impossible for him to run his office, however economically he might manage it.

But there will doubtless be furnished for the information of the Committee of the Whole and of the House carefully prepared statistics which will show exactly how this proposed change will operate in case this bill should become a law with this feature of new legislation in it.

There seems to be an impression upon the part of one or two, possibly more, members of the House that these pension agents work for five or six days in each quarter, when they are rushing out these vouchers, and that they are gentlemen of leisure for the remainder of the quarter. That impression is formed carelessly and without investigation. I have had enough experience to know that the pension agent who runs his office so as to be prepared to pay the pensioners promptly at each recurring day for the payment of pensions must have a carefully organized office and work day and night, or the affairs of his office will fall into great confusion.

The vouchers which are sent out are prepared in the interval between the pay periods. There is a great deal of correspondence with persons who have to be carefully corresponded with in order to keep them advised of their rights. In the case of new pensions which are granted payments must be made in the intervals between the regular pay periods. There are also more or less persons drawing their pensions irregularly, those who did not get in their vouchers so as to be paid promptly. So the work goes on, books are kept, reports are prepared, money drawn, calculations made with reference to the coming pay-day. The pension agent is a man who is obliged to be industriously at work all the time.

And what is more, something is certainly due to the man who is responsible for the handling and proper disbursement of large sums of money, sometimes for a particular quarter at some of these agencies running up to hundreds of thousands of dollars. These gentlemen, therefore, can not be assailed on that ground. I do not propose, however, to talk longer on that subject.

It is proposed by further new legislation on this bill to reduce the number of pension agents in the United States from eighteen, which I think is the number at present, to twelve. Already in some regions of the United States a single pension agent pays the pensioners in as many as nine States. It is stated, and I have no doubt that the statement would be verified by careful investigation and experience, that whenever frauds are practiced upon the pension agent (and I trust that they occur very rarely) they generally occur a long distance from the point where he is located, not in the region of country immediately around him, but at distant points, where fraudulent identification, &c., can be gotten up. I do not believe it is wise to reduce the number of pension agents, and thereby so concentrate the work upon a single officer as to require him to pay too great a number of persons, for all these pensioners are presumably needy, and should be paid promptly on the day fixed by law.

But section 2 of this bill, to which I specially desire to call attention, proposes to fix a fee of $10 as the utmost amount which may be paid, demanded, or received by any agent or attorney in any pension case. It is provided that this shall be the only fee paid, received, or demanded.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is very likely that at this late day it would be unwise to undertake to go back and establish the policy that every pensioner should employ his own attorney or claim agent upon such terms as he may choose to make. But a large number of persons who are applicants for pensions believe they would be better served, would obtain their pensions more promptly, if they were permitted to make their own contracts with their attorneys. They believe that in this way they would be able to employ more responsible and better trained attorneys. But it is very likely we can not go back upon our tracks and establish an entirely different policy from that which has now prevailed for years. But it is perfectly certain to my mind that we must do something in this matter; that the policy under which we are working at present is a very bad policy. In view of the present state of things, I favor a limitation upon the amount that is to be paid, which will prevent the attorney from obtaining any more than a given amount. I favor this because I think there is great danger of imposition. I, however, do not concur in the provision of the bill fixing this sum at $10 in all cases.

Let us see how this matter works, and let us speak plainly in regard to it. I believe that any member who would investigate concerning the pension attorneys in his own district would find that more money is paid to these attorneys on claims which are never passed through the Pension Office than upon claims that do go through. How does this happen? A poor widow, or any other person who feels entitled to a pension, or it may be somebody representing orphan children, goes to an unreliable attorney—unreliable in more ways than one—unreliable because perhaps he is not a man of integrity, and also unreliable because he does not understand the legal principles and rules that apply in the matter of proving up a pension case. He does not know perhaps the classes of persons who are entitled to the bounty of the Government under the pension laws. But in spite of this ignorance he is ready to say to the applicants, who are quite unable to throw away their money, "I will make an application for you." He makes the application upon a blank, charging a certain sum, which is required to be paid in advance. This sum is paid, and the application is sent to the Pension Office. About the next thing that is heard of this case is a letter which comes to the member of Congress from that district, asking about this claim; and more than half of these cases are found to be cases in which it is impossible to imagine that the applicant was entitled to a pension under any law of the United States. In more than one-half of these cases the claim agent never expected, after forwarding the application, to pay any further attention to the matter or to hear anything from it. But the inquiries are sent to us. Members of Congress are receiving inquiries—are writing and referring letters by the hundreds and thousands. We are employing competent clerks who are daily engaged in answering letters which we receive in regard to claims that never had any foundation.

Others of these claims are probably good—claims which ought to be granted; but the claim agent, who receives his money in advance, is in many cases unable, if he is willing, to go to distant parts of the country to look up the proper testimony in support of the claim, and he never does it. Thus the claim can not be allowed at the Pension Office because the attorney, for the amount of money he receives, can not hunt up the evidence or carry on the correspondence necessary to secure the allowance of the claim. Thus the claim hangs on year after year. I have recently received an inquiry about a claim of this kind seventeen years old, and ever since I have been a member of Congress, now more than seven years, I have been constantly corresponding with somebody in regard to that particular claim. The experience of other members is no doubt the same. In many of these cases perhaps the claimant would have obtained his pension in the first instance if he had had a competent attorney.

Mr. PETERS. Is there a particle of information to be obtained by the applicant for a pension that can not be obtained either at the Pension Office or through the member of Congress?

Mr. KEIFER. I think perhaps there is no information that can not be obtained in that way.

Mr. LONG. No information at this end of the line, but there is a great deal to be done at the other end in the way of picking up testimony, &c.

Mr. KEIFER. No doubt it is necessary in many cases that there should be a pension attorney.

Mr. PETERS. But is it not the fact that the pension attorney is needed at the home of the applicant and not here?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, sir; I agree to that. But the policy is to have pension attorneys here; many of them represent thousands of cases. There is hardly a day on which we do not receive letters—I have received such letters this very morning—from people in our districts, inclosing letters of pension attorneys in this city asking the applicant to appeal to his member of Congress to do certain things toward preparing the case and obtaining the pension.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I do not care to interrupt the gentleman only to say that is illustrative of the evils of this present pension system. I desire to state I now have in my possession letters from pension attorneys residing in this city to soldiers in my district saying, "Send your $10 with your papers, and I will do all I can. If your claim does not go through I will return the money." They have only taken the papers and placed them on file, and never have done anything else in the case. When the claim has been rejected, and the poor soldier at home is out of his $10 and his family are suffering for the want of it, they can not get enough money to come here and prosecute the miserable, dishonest attorney. Still they go on with this system of fraud, and no attention is paid to it.

I therefore say, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment and my belief this limitation ought to be "wiped out." Let us give the soldiers of the Republic the credit of possessing common sense, common intelligence, and the ability to manage their own business, and when they have that then they can employ a good attorney, an attorney of the Supreme Court, and pay him what he is worth, and have their pension cases properly attended to.

Mr. KEIFER. I am obliged to the gentleman from New York for his suggestion, which is directly in the line in which I am speaking. It is, of course, an open question what policy we should finally adopt. And I wish while I am upon the floor to say one thing against the usual plan of making applications for pensions. I hope gentlemen will think of it. If these persons who are entitled under the law to receive pensions were allowed and required to employ competent counsel in the first instance it would be largely in the interest of the Government as well as of the claimant.

What I say and mean is that not only should the application be made within a given period of time, but the applicant, through a proper and well-qualified attorney, should prepare his case and submit it for final decision, if you please; that the necessary proof should show disability, and that it arose in the line of duty; that it was disability received from wounds or disease contracted in the service; that all the proof should be brought together and arranged, and that then it should be submitted for final decision, of course leaving the right to every party to amend his case on newly discovered evidence, and leaving also the discretion to the Commissioner of Pensions or proper persons passing on these claims to allow them to amend and correct mere errors in the preparation of the cases. But we go on now preparing and preparing as evidence is requested, and pressure is made on the part of the applicant to seek out and find somebody somewhere to furnish what is needed in the matter of testimony until the case is finally worked through. It is not always in the interest of the Government to allow this mode of preparing cases having to advise from time to time the claimant in each case what further testimony is needed. In my judgment it is not in the interest of the Government that that line of proceeding should be further followed.

A MEMBER. If we were to allow no solicitation, instead of being robbed out of $10 would not the pensioner be robbed out of $25 or $50?

Mr. KEIFER. I am not able to say about that. In practice it may be true as the gentleman says. If these pension applicants understood, as they ought to understand, that they are responsible for their own attorney, that they must get a well-qualified and responsible attorney, they would probably be more careful as to the person they employed. In the counties all over the United States there are well-qualified attorneys. Some perhaps would not be willing to take a case of this sort, but there are competent, well-qualified, excellent young lawyers, who would train themselves to do this sort of work and do it well. They would learn what was requisite in order to get a claim through, what character of evidence was essential, what form was necessary, how many witnesses were required, and how to submit the claim for pension in every particular. As it is I think there is hardly a well-trained, well-educated lawyer, old or young, in the counties who is willing to take a case of that sort. I believe that is the testimony of gentlemen all round me who know anything of these matters. It is a bad state of things where there is so much money to be taken out of the Treasury, so much to be paid on lifetime pensions, that the leading lawyers, and even ordinary lawyers, will not even look at a case of this kind, so that all these matters drift into the hands of persons who set themselves up as pension attorneys, many of them knowing no principle of law or rule of evidence.

It has grown to be the belief that it is one of the duties of a legislator in the Congress of the United States to hunt up proof and to press pension cases before the Pension Office. It has grown to be so much the custom, a matter of so much grace on our part, that there is not any of them who will now refuse to do it. We have tried to do the best we can, but at the same time we are merely helping out a lame and dangerous policy in this way.

Now, I had prepared with some little thought a plan for the gradation of the payment of pension attorneys. I am not very well satisfied with it myself, but I should propose to give not more than $10 where the pensioner was not allowed to exceed the sum of $100 a year, and up to $20 where the pension granted reached the sum of $200 a year, and $25 if it was above that, and so on in that way to make the gradations and try to relieve this matter; and I provide, also, that the payment of the pension attorney shall come out of the first payment of the pension after it has been allowed, and be paid to him by the officer charged with the payment of the pension.

The effect of this course would be to enable the attorney, after he has done his work on the faith of the case and presented it on his judgment after an examination, believing that there was a good case on the first examination, and when he was successful in getting the case allowed he would be sure of his fee. The cases would then receive better attention; and this payment to the attorney should not depend upon the whim of anybody, but the agent should pay him at the time he makes the first payment to the pensioner, deducting this amount from the first payment. That would be just to the agents, to the claimants, and to the attorneys at the same time. It would be very likely to enlist lawyers and men of judgment whose examination of these cases would be worth something, and in my judgment it would have the effect of weeding out fully one-half of the applications which now encumber the Pension Office and enable us to reduce the pension force in the matter of clerks largely indeed. It would also relieve us of the work which we are doing here, making applications about rejected and imperfect cases and all that sort of thing. In view of this belief I may offer an amendment as a substitute for section 2 of the bill. If I am unable to get one that is exactly in accord with my views it will be simply because I am not certain that we can change so radically a policy that we have been running upon for so long a time.

Mr. MORRILL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to ask the gentleman if he would not consent to have the whole of this section stricken out without amendment and let the Committee on Pensions report a bill providing for this question of attorneys' fees?

Mr. KEIFER. I would be glad of that, but I am satisfied that the Pensions Committee would only report the bill. That is about all. They would never get it up for consideration. You would never get it through the House. We will be going on in the future in the evil course that we are now pursuing and gain no good results. But if I can have any assurance that we can get a bill through or on the Calendar in some relation that we can reach it, I would rather trust that committee who have examined the whole subject than to submit an amendment based upon my own judgment.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman permit me a moment to make a suggestion in the line of his agument? I stated, perhaps when the gentleman from Ohio was absent from the Hall, that the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay have been for some time considering among other subjects this particular one, and to-morrow has been set apart for a meeting of that committee for the purpose of disposing of that bill. And I will say furthermore that the committee are anxious to report a bill upon this and one other kindred subject which they have been carefully examining, and when reported it will be pressed with all possible haste through the House.

Mr. KEIFER. I have only to say that I am afraid it will get on the Calendar simply, and there it will remain. You will hear no more of it for this session. The gentleman on my right [Mr. POLAND] thinks that we had better strike out this section. I agree as to that, for I would like to have some reform in this policy.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Let me ask the gentleman a question. There are some things in this second section that strike me as peculiar to say the least, and inasmuch as I am in the dark here upon them I would like to have a little light from the gentleman from Ohio. There is in this bill a provision with reference to the payment for lost horses—lost-horse cases—and I would like to know whether it is the intention of this committee to put our pensioners down upon a par with or in the same category with claims for lost horses? Shall claims for pensions and claims for lost horses come into the same category and in the same law, and are they to be upon the same plane? In my judgment they should not. What is the idea of the committee in that respect? It seems to me that the second section should go out. We take care of our pensioners here in one way; now let us make provision for our lost horses in another.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. KEIFER. I will say first to the gentleman from New York that I am not the author of this clause in the bill. I am not responsible for it. But I think the gentleman submits his question wrong end first; that the policy of this bill was to put the claims for lost horses down on a par, in so far as the amounts to be paid for attorneys is concerned, with the claims for pensions.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. RAY, of New York. Let me say to the gentleman that my idea in asking the question was that I do not think we can afford in the eyes of the country to put claims for lost horses and our pensioners in the same category. I think there is a moral obligation, and it is certainly the feeling of this country, that claims for pensions should stand upon a higher plane than claims for lost horses.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman no doubt is right about that.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I wish to explain that I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] addressed his question to the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay. It seems I was mistaken.

Mr. KEIFER. There are many things I might have said upon this subject. I have only outlined my objections to the policy, which the Committee on Appropriations are not responsible for, and to some of the legislation proposed by this bill. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HART].

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] takes his seat I wish to ask him a question for information. I find no information in the report or in the bill as to special examiners in the Pension Department. As I understand, there are now about two hundred and sixty special examiners. But whatever the number is, whether it is large or small, I would like to know whether it is in the power of this House or in the power of the Commissioner of Pensions to increase that number if necessary in order that cases which are referred to special examiners may be considered. I frequently have cases where the applicants have been referred to a special examiner as much as a year and a half ago, and it seems an actual impossibility to secure and examine the case, simply because there are not special examiners enough. I would like a little information in regard to this point, and I presume there are other gentlemen in the same position as myself.

Mr. KEIFER. I think there is nothing in the bill touching that matter.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me, I will say to my colleague [Mr. SKINNER] there was last year permanent legislation enacted by an appropriation bill, as I now recall it, giving the Commissioner of Pensions the power to detail as many special examiners as he thinks necessary. He can detail clerks from his office, who have power to take evidence and make examinations. As I recall it, there is no such title affixed to them as special examiners. But they have the power to administer oaths so as to make false statements amount to perjury. And the Commissioner of Pensions can organize that force as he pleases.

Mr. KEIFER. That is a matter which will come up further along.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KEIFER. For a question.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I desire to say to the Chair that it is impossible for members around me to know what is being said in the colloquy on the other side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] if he does not understand, as I have been personally informed by the Commissioner of Pensions this morning, that the Commissioner has made an application or a recommendation to this House for authority to appoint one hundred and fifty more of these special examiners and that he has stated the absolute necessity for them?

Mr. KEIFER. I can only say that that request will be considered in the Committee on Appropriations in connection with the legislative bill, where it properly belongs. It does not belong to this appropriation bill. And that also answers the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER].

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEIFER. As I have promised a portion of my time, I ask that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK], who has been obliged to go away, be permitted to print some remarks which he has prepared that are pertinent to this bill.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

Mr. KEIFER. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HART].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HART] is entitled to twenty-five minutes.

Mr. HART. I thank my friend and colleague from Ohio for the opportunity he has given me to address the House. There is no subject in which my constituents have a greater interest than that of pensions for the men who served in the Army and Navy of the United States during the civil war. This interest is not confined alone to soldiers and their families, but exists throughout the entire community. I should feel that I had failed to discharge an important duty as well as failed to exercise a great privilege if I allowed this session to close without presenting and urging upon the House the necessity of more liberal legislation and of greater appropriations for the benefit of this important class of the American people.

The soldiers of the Union Army enlisted under peculiar circumstances. The Government was almost in the agony of dissolution. Its credit was destroyed and its Treasury empty. The soldier was compelled to take his wages in a depreciated currency. The money compensation he received was small in comparison to the value of his services. It is true that his contract of enlistment contained nothing upon the subject of future reward or advancement. There was, however, a very general feeling and understanding with the body of the people that he and his family should be remembered beyond the mere compensation named in the contract.

We promised in substance and effect that his wife and children should be provided for in his absence; that when he returned from the war he should be made to feel that he was gratefully remembered by his countrymen. It was not so "nominated in the bond," but I submit that it was so understood, and while this was not his motive for enlistment, he went out to battle feeling that if he died his family would be cared for, and that if he returned with an honorable record the country would not only offer words of praise and congratulation, but would also render substantial aid in case of need. We are now in a position to carry out that common understanding, that implied contract. It is not a matter of charity but of justice.

These soldiers are not paupers asking for alms; they are heroes, honorable men, demanding their rights. It would be a burning shame if the Government should permit any soldier of the Union Army ever to go to the poor house, and yet there are thousands of men who served faithfully and who to-day, on account of disease, age, or infirmity, are beginning to look with anxiety to the future, and are wondering whether their last days are to be spent in hunger and poverty almost in sight of the Capitol of the nation that was saved by their valor. There are children whose fathers lie upon the field of battle; there are widows whose husbands went down to death in the strength of their manhood who are to-day, as we all know, struggling with want. These are common statements, but everybody knows them to be true.

PENSION LAWS—PRIOR SOUNDNESS.

I wish now to call your attention to some of the statutes relating to this subject of pensions. Experience has shown them to be in many respects very defective, and however well and conscientiously the Pension Office may be administered, serious injustice is often done. One of the mistakes of the law and of the Department enforcing the law is in requiring applicants for pensions to prove that they were sound before entering the service. Hundreds of claims are rejected, I know this has been the case in my own district, upon this ground: The applicant proves his enlistment, his service, his sickness and disability while in the Army, his honorable discharge; but his claim is rejected because there is a suspicion that he was not entirely sound before entering the Army.

I submit that this is a grievous wrong. When the Government has examined a man prior to enlistment, has pronounced him sound, has mustered him in, has accepted his services, and he has proved a faithful and honest soldier, it should be forever estopped from denying him a pension upon the ground of disease or sickness prior to enlistment. To reject a claim solely for this reason is an illiberality and littleness unbecoming a great nation whose very peace and prosperity are the fruits of soldierly valor and suffering. The law and its administration in this respect should be corrected at once.

A MEMBER. That is very true.

A MEMBER. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, I will state the Committee on the Payment of Pension, Bounty, and Back Pay have reported a bill prescribing precisely the rule he lays down.

Mr. HART. I understand that is so. It is an important and long-felt want existing in the administration of the Pension Bureau. To reject a claim on that ground is, as I have said, an illiberality on the part of the Government unbecoming a great nation whose very life was saved by the valor and services of these men.

A MEMBER. And I would add that it is more than illiberality, it is an outrage.

RIGHT TO ARREARS.

Mr. HART. Another feature of the pension laws which is clearly unjust is that it refuses arrears of pensions to such persons as filed their applications since July 1, 1880. Many of the best and most meritorious soldiers after the war closed thought they could get along without Government aid. They desired to be independent, and although suffering from wounds and disability arising in the service they were loath to seek assistance. As years roll by they are reluctantly forced to the conclusion that they must apply for aid. They file their applications and find that they have by their delay deprived themselves of important and valuable rights.

It often happens that the bravest and best soldier, the one who never goes to the hospital if he can help it, and who never leaves the ranks as long as he is able to stand, is the last to make complaint or to seek for assistance. There should be no statute of limitations against a soldier's pension. No time should ever come that the country refuses to listen to his prayer. The Departments should always be open to him and ready to consider his case upon its merits. It should be a sufficient pass-word to say that he was a soldier of the Union, and no delay upon his part to present his claim should be permitted to stand in the way of merited relief.

PROOFS IN PENSION CASES.

There is another thing wherein the administration of the law needs correction. I refer to the proofs required and the rules of evidence applied to the adjudication of pension claims. It is now over nineteen years since the war closed. Every day adds to the difficulty in obtaining evidence. Records are destroyed or lost, officers, surgeons, comrades, and friends are many of them dead or scattered to the ends of the earth. The memories of men fail them; the recollection of transactions and events becomes faint and obscure, and under these circumstances to apply to each case an iron and rigid rule operates as an absolute denial of justice.

I am not disposed to criticise the administration of the Pension Office. The gentlemen in charge of that department, as I am glad to bear testimony, are men of distingnished ability and high character, and they are conscientiously and honestly discharging the important and delicate duties of their position. I have, however, at times been impressed with the idea that in the examination of cases their subordinates are too much inclined to presume everything against a soldier and against the integrity of his claim, and they search for grounds upon which to reject it. They are not liberal in the construction of the rules of evidence. Many claims of high merit are sacrificed to the application of narrow and technical rules.

These pension laws should at all times be administered in a broad and liberal spirit and in full view of the purposes to be accomplished. The brave and conscientious soldier, who scorns all tricks and unworthy artifices, finds himself entirely helpless. He feels in his heart that he is entitled to a pension, but the required evidence is entirely beyond his reach. Hence he must go his way unassisted, and he feels that he is forgotten and neglected by his countrymen. It was not so in the days of the war. He remembers very distinctly what promises were made to him then. He remembers how his neighbors and friends gathered around him; he remembers how they applauded his patriotism, and how earnestly they assured him that when the war was over he should never want for bread or raiment or support, and that his wife and children should be the peculiar objects of the nation's care. And as he bid them good by to take his place in the ranks of the Army; these assurances gave him faith and courage. He remembers the stern vicissitudes of the bloody struggle, the heat, the cold, the long marches, the dreary days and nights, the fierce onset of battle. Now, after it is all over, when the aches and pains and infirmities of life have come upon him, when his capacity for labor is growing less and his wants and necessities increase, and he is forced to contemplate a miserable and destitute old age, and possibly beyond it a pauper's grave, he feels, and justly feels, that his services are not appreciated and that his country is ungrateful.

I do not blame him. I am in receipt of letters almost every day upon this subject, and the pictures of anxiety and helplessness are enough to make one's heart ache. If the nation was poor, if we were in the midst of calamity, or if the exigencies of the times were such as to require great expenditure of money and strength in some other direction, the case would be different. But there is no such excuse. The Treasury is full, our revenues are enormous, every day adds to our wealth and power; and now, when the veterans of the Army who have survived the struggle and the children of their dead comrades appeal to the nation for food, for clothing, for education, and for homes, it should be deemed an honor and a privilege for the American Congress to "care for him who has borne the battle and for his widow and his orphans."

No nation can be true to itself which does not recognize its supreme obligation to reward the defenders of its honor and its life.

I come now to another point to which I desire to direct the attention of the House.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Permit me to interrupt you a moment before you take up another subject. You call attention to the rules of evidence in pension cases. I desire to ask you if in your judgment the rule adopted by the Pension Bureau can be defended which makes a distinction between the evidence of a private soldier and that of an officer and a distinction in favor of the officer?

Mr. HART. I do not think it is a just rule.

Mr. RAY, of New York. You believe it to be unjust?

Mr. HART. I do.

Mr. RAY, of New York. So do I.

Mr. WELLER. And so do I.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. So do I.

Mr. HART. There are thousands of honest claims pending in the Pension Department as to which there can be no relief unless the testimony of the private soldier can be received and given its full force and effect.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Is not the private soldier more likely to have known the physical condition and the sufferings of his fellow than any officer?

Mr. HART. Certainly; he is a great deal more likely to know the facts, and there is no reason why his testimony is not entitled to as high consideration as that of the commissioned officer.

PENSIONS ON GROUND OF SERVICE.

I now come to another feature of the subject to which I would direct the attention of the House. The first week of the session I had the honor to introduce a pension bill, which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, where it still remains. I hope it may be reported at an early day and brought to the consideration of the House. There is danger, however, that it may be stranded or strangled under the application of some of the rules of this body.

With all due respect I take the liberty of saying that the rules of the House are so mysteriously and wonderfully constructed as to render it almost impossible, especially toward the latter end of the session, to get a subject fairly heard and considered upon its merits. It seems as though they had been framed for the express purpose of preventing free discussion and necessary and important legislation.

The bill to which I have referred as introduced by myself provides that every man who served faithfully in the Army or Navy of the United States for the period of one year or more since the 4th of March, 1861, and who was honorably discharged, shall after arriving at the age of 55 years be entitled to a pension of $4 per month, and after arriving at the age of 60 years shall be entitled to $8 per month during the remainder of his life. It further provides that every man who has served faithfully in the Army and Navy of the United States for a period of one year or more and was honorably discharged, and who by reason of injuries or sickness is so disabled as to be unable to perform any manual labor, shall be entitled to a pension of $8 per month, whether the disability arose in the service or not, and it also provides for a restoration of the right to arrears of pensions.

Since the introduction of the bill I have received many communications from soldiers approving the measure, but it is suggested that the ages fixed in the bill should be 45 and 50 instead of 55 and 60. I should be very willing to have the measure changed in this respect if by so doing its passage would not be endangered in the House. I am anxious that something should be done in this direction. I respectfully submit to the House that the provisions of this bill are founded in sound policy. It is also a necessity, in order to do anything like justice to the soldiers of the Union Army.

I have already called attention to the great difficulty in securing proof in pension cases and to the fact that this difficulty constantly increases. There is a very large body of soldiers who now feel the need of pensions who under existing laws are entirely excluded. Under the present rules of the Pension Office they are unable to show any disability which accrued in the service. They can not name the day or the place when any sickness began or when any disability had its origin. They do, however, know the great and significant fact that in consequence of exposure, of overexertion long continued, their ability to labor has been lessened, that they are prematurely old, that pains and infirmities come upon them at an earlier date, that their lives have been shortened, and that their pleasures and enjoyments have been lessened. Long marches in the storm, sleeping on the ground, poor and insufficient food, extraordinary and exhausting labor, all have left their mark. For this class there is no remedy under existing laws. The pension which this bill proposes is a service-pension. In equity the claims of these men might be placed upon the ground of disability in the service, for undoubtedly it did arise there, but clear and definite proof of this fact is impossible under the circumstances of the case. I am disposed therefore to place the pension upon the ground of a just recognition by the Government of the bravery and valuable service rendered by these men.

I would publicly acknowledge, and embody that acknowledgment in the form of a clear and definite statute, the immense debt of gratitude which we owe to these defenders of the Union. I would say to them in substance: "Do not feel anxious or look with foreboding to the future. You shall never be forgotten by your country; you shall never want for the necessaries of life so long as the nation lives and the flag floats. In your lives you shall be supported and honored, your graves shall be sacred, and your names and deeds shall be enrolled upon the brightest page of your country's history." There is no action that could be taken by the Congress of the United States which would be hailed with greater delight by the great body of the American people than the passage of a law which would secure to every soldier of the Union Army a pension.

VALUE OF SERVICE AND RESULTS ACCOMPLISHED.

If you consider the character of the services on the one hand and the results and fruits of the struggle on the other you will be compelled to admit the supreme justice of this claim. Look at the state of affairs when he went into the service and contrast it with our present condition. Then we were in the midst of a great calamity. The flames of civil war were climbing up and winding around the very columns of the temple. The country was circled at night with burning camp-fires. The land shook with the tread of armies and the thunder of battle. Fear and anxiety were in all hearts. Those who constituted the very flower of our youth and manhood were enlisting and fighting for the flag and thousands and tens of thousands were marching to their deaths. It was at such a time as this that the soldier made his contract of enlistment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ELLIS. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HART. Ten minutes.

Mr. ELLIS. I will yield it out of my time.

Mr. HART. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the scene is changed. Out from the midst of these terrible days the country has emerged into the broad light of liberty and peace. The graves that were opened then are closed now and covered with the flowers of spring. The scars that the war made are becoming obliterated. The sections once in conflict are now being welded together in the bonds of fraternal love, I trust never more to be separated, and the country and its people have entered upon a career of prosperity unexampled in history.

As we survey the situation, looking first upon one scene and then upon the other, contrasting the sorrow of that day and the joy of this, the perils of that day and the security of this, as we behold a government composed of prosperous States no longer at war but engaged in generous rivalry for wealth and honor, all under the same flag, and marching onward to still greater achievements, how should our hearts warm toward the noble band of patriots by and through whose efforts this wonderful and happy change has been wrought. For myself, when I think of these things and contemplate the golden results of that mighty conflict I feel like uncovering my head in the presence of these defenders and saviors of the nation.

Only by their valor and suffering was our prosperity rendered possible, and but for them the nation would not exist to-day. No man can estimate the value of the Union. No man can tell the measure of blessing which has come even to the present generation, and when you add to this the increasing glory and power of the Republic in centuries to come, you can in some slight degree begin to understand the nature and immensity of the debt which we owe to the men who filled the ranks of the Army and Navy of the United States during the civil war.

I am aware that some of the members of this House object to all pensions and pension laws not based upon the idea of physical disability. They hold that a purely service-pension is erroneous in principle. I can not agree with them; on the contrary, I believe the idea to be founded in justice and sound policy. It has been frequently recognized in this country and by the laws of Congress. Only a few days since we passed, under a suspension of the rules, a bill giving to every man who had served in the Mexican war for sixty days a pension. This bill was based solely upon the idea of service. By that bill we granted a pension to men who since their service in Mexico have been soldiers in the confederate army. By that bill men who fought for the Government for only sixty days and against the Government for four years are granted a service-pension. With what sort of propriety, then, can you now refuse to consider the claims of the men who rendered honest service for their country and who never betrayed it, but were always true and loyal to the flag?

It has been suggested to me that the passage of my bill would result in making heavy drafts upon the Treasury. If this be true it neither changes the principle nor the justice of the claim I make. It comes with a poor grace for a nation so rich and powerful as ours to make a plea of poverty against the soldiers. I have already referred to the immense revenues of the Government and our ability to meet any just and reasonable demands. Already the attention of the country is directed to the immense sums of money lying idle in the Treasury, and the best judgment of American statesmen is invoked as to the proper method of lessening the income and of disbursing the surplus. I would not advocate extravagance in any direction, but I do insist that we are now in a condition to deal justly and fairly by all our deserving citizens. There is no accurate means of determining how many persons would be benefited by the provisions of this bill or what sum of money would be required from year to year.

Of the 2,000,000 men who enlisted in the Army and Navy it is safe to say that over one-quarter are already in their graves; probably one-half would be nearer a correct estimate. Their ranks are rapidly diminishing. The burden imposed upon the Government will not be a heavy one, but whether heavy or light, it will be cheerfully and gladly borne by the people. I therefore most earnestly invoke the attention of the House to this subject, and express the hope that more just and liberal laws may be enacted and that abundant appropriations will be made.

Mr. ELLIS. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I have only a few practical observations to make, and they relate to the second section of the bill. By the courtesy of the gentleman in charge of the bill I said a few moments ago that I should move at the proper time to strike out that section. I desire in the time that I shall now consume to state the reasons why I think that section of the bill ought to be stricken out.

I regret I did not know this bill would be reached to-day, for in that event I might have presented my views more clearly and concisely than I shall be able to do, not having arranged or matured them with reference to this bill, which I had not seen until this discussion began. I can, however, point out the defects, as I believe, the section contains, and note the conclusions to which my mind has been brought by the investigation of the subject in the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, where this subject has been under consideration for some time. I invite attention now to the second section of the bill. It provides as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 1 of the act entitled "An act relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases," approved the 20th day of June, A. D. 1878, be, and the same is hereby, made applicable to bounty, arrears-of-pay, lost-horse, and bounty-land cases, and pension cases in which arrears of pension are or shall be claimed or granted. And the fee of $10 prescribed by law shall not be payable to nor demanded or received by any agent or attorney in any pension case, whether for arrears or otherwise, or in any bounty, arrears-of-pay, lost-horse, or bounty-land case, in whole or in part, until such claim shall be allowed.

If you will examine the section named—and for the information of the committee I will read the first portion of it—you will observe that the section originally only applied to pensions. It is in the following words:

It shall be unlawful for any attorney, agent, or other person to demand or receive for his services in any pension case a greater sum than $10.

The present bill extends the provisions of the section which I have just read to the additional class of cases that I have named, namely, to bounty, arrears-of-pay, lost-horse, and bounty-land cases, as well as to pension cases, in which arrears of pension are or shall be claimed or granted.

Every person, Mr. Chairman, who has had any connection whatever with the prosecution of claims of this class—and I state frankly that I have not except in one single instance, but I get this information from others—every person who has had experience in the prosecution of pension claims knows that the great difficulty arises in cases where arrears of pension are involved. Take this character of case for example: The seed of a disease is sown in the war, say twenty years ago. It develops gradually, until five, ten, or fifteen years afterward the soldier becomes disabled and entitled to a pension. Under the pension laws, in order to procure his pension, he must trace that disease back to the Army and identify its origin with the service.

Let me ask gentlemen if they appreciate the difficulty that must arise in thousands of cases for a man who is honorably and justly entitled to his pension to make that proof? And if you leave him to make the proof he never can, for in seven out of ten instances the papers when prepared do not meet the requirements of the Pension Office, and they are rejected and sent back for amendment or alteration, and the work is to be gone over and over and over again.

And these last remarks, Mr. Chairman, are equally applicable not only to the pensioners themselves, but they are applicable as well to incompetent counsel unable to prepare the required proofs to maintain their cases under the regulations of the Pension Office. They are incompetent to present the case as it should be presented under the law. Who will say, where shall we find a member of the bar in this body who will tell us that in the prosecution of cases of this character honorable and competent counsel can be found to engage in them and perform the work that is frequently required at the pitiful sum which this bill proposes—$10 for each application? And shall we deny to men who are entitled honorably under the laws of the country to a pension the privilege of securing it by passing a law prohibiting him from paying counsel to prosecute a difficult but a worthy claim? I say, sir, that it is unwise; that it is unjust. It is not conservative legislation, and ought not to be indorsed by this committee.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is there any question—intricate question of law arising in the pension cases as a rule? Is it not ordinarily a question of fact, that any ordinary clerk or commissioner can determine? If it requires any particular legal skill I would like the gentleman to point it out.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I give you, sir, the benefit of such information as I have myself received from others. I have already stated that I have no practical experience. I understand that difficult and intricate questions arise in the interpretation and the construction of the pension laws; and I state further, on the information which I have received, that the greatest difficulty is the establishment of the facts by legal and competent evidence—facts which are often required in order to trace the disease back to its source and identify its origin with the service. There are difficult and intricate facts which arise in connection with the medical testimony required; questions not only requiring an acquaintance with the forms of law, but involving the highest skill of the medical fraternity for a proper determination of the case, and, as my friend here suggests, a thorough knowledge of the laws of evidence. I will add that just such ill-digested and unconsidered legislation as this proposed will inevitably increase these difficulties and foster litigation.

I hope, sir, that I may be permitted to progress in the discussion of this question without interruption, and I shall endeavor to make my remarks applicable I hope to the bill without unnecessarily prolonging the debate.

The next class to which this provision is attempted to be extended by this bill is as to lost horses. I myself in my political beliefs and doctrines have always favored just as little legislation as is consistent with sound policy and good government. And are we to be told that the officers of the Federal Army are not to be allowed to control their own business transactions? Are they not capable of making their own contracts with competent counsel and attending to their own business? Nobody except an officer is entitled to payment for lost horses. I say, therefore, it is not a creditable thing to the officers themselves or the country, nor is it consistent with a sound and intelligent public policy, to undertake by legislation to make the Pension Office a guardian for the officers of the Federal Army. As a rule they are entirely capable of attending to their own business matters.

Let us take another step. The third class also is open to objection. The argument which I have made in relation to the other two classes is equally applicable to this. It applies to pension cases in which arrears of pension are or shall be claimed or granted. But I say this provision is open to another objection.

Will gentlemen contend that that is wise or conservative legislation which invades contracts already made between parties? And yet that objection can be urged to more than one provision of this bill; by its very terms it not only applies to cases where the claims shall be made hereafter, but as to those where claims have already been made and where under the law the contracts may have been made perhaps years ago. It operates retroactively.

Take the case of an officer who began five years ago the prosecution of a claim for a lost horse or for arrears of pension. He has employed counsel, and after the counsel has worked under contract for two, three, five, or six years Congress comes in and says to the counsel "you shall not receive more than $10." And it makes this statement to officers of the Army and to counsel who have entered into contracts with them. It is not conservative legislation. If any State in the Union should undertake to pass a law like that, the Federal Constitution would be invoked and it would be declared unconstitutional. And yet that is what Congress is asked to do in the second provision of this bill. Let me read another clause of this section.

And the fee of $10 prescribed by law shall not be payable nor demanded or received by any agent or attorney in any pension case, whether for arrears or otherwise; or in any bounty arrears-of-pay, lost-horse, or bounty-land case, in whole or in part, until such claim shall be allowed.

The result of our investigations has brought my mind to the conclusion that the latter part of that provision embodies a correct principle. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] elaborated that subject, and perhaps I ought not to stop to discuss it further than he has discussed it; and yet I think I can throw some additional light upon it.

Let me illustrate for a moment. Here is a firm of attorneys. The Pension Office has construed the existing law so that attorneys could collect these fees in advance, and unscrupulous parties have issued circulars sending them out to all parts of the country in which they tell persons they were entitled to pensions and to send in their claims. As soon as the claim comes a demand is made for a fee of $2, $3, $6, or $10, and in thousands of cases they get it, and when they have gotten it they drop the case. Two or three different firms and perhaps more may by collusion accomplish the same result (and I have been informed it has been done) under the construction put upon this law by the Pension Office. And, as a last resort, when pressed by the applicant, they advise their clients to urge their member of Congress to visit the Pension Office and the case will be hastened or granted upon his personal solicitation. In this way members are compelled to do unnecessary work, when the attorney knew at the time he undertook the claim that under the law the parties were not entitled to a pension. And thus they saddle the responsibility on the member of Congress from the district and swindle the claimants out of all they can get in the prosecution of groundless claims.

I say, therefore, that feature of the bill which denies these unscrupulous parties the right to collect $1 of the fee until they procure the pension is not only a correct one, but a protection to honest practitioners. But $10 allowed, and the collection if so limited will not cover all the cases. One gentleman on the other side thinks that these claimants ought to be allowed, privates an l officers alike, to control these contracts themselves. But I say to him and to others that the result of our investigation is that there is a golden mean between these two extremes. I would limit them in the cases I have indicated to a fee of $10, and not allow them to collect one cent until they have procured a pension. Then in these extraordinary cases, as prosecuting for arrears, for lost horses, and for the other classes of claims I have pointed out, let them contract for some greater sum, subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions, if you think best; the amount being limited, if you please, say to $25, or if you think it better to $50, certainly not above $50, because in many cases they would be unable to make anything at $10. Many cases will not be taken by competent counsel at that sum. Perhaps $25 would do. For if they get some cases where $25 does not pay them, there will still be an equalization in the easy prosecution of other cases at that sum. The main thing is to prevent these attorneys from practicing extortion on the ignorant. Make them perform the work before they receive a dollar of the fee, and you have then a wise, sound, and conservative principle on which to proceed; and if you allow a contract as high as $25 in difficult cases, you will enable many meritorious cases to be correctly determined which would otherwise be defeated for want of competent counsel. In other words, you exclude to a great extent the bad element among the practitioners, secure better service, and provide for all meritorious cases.

Let me illustrate the importance of that position. I said that in the course of my practice I had had experience in only one pension case. I have had it in two others, and, as it illustrates the point under discussion, I will tell you what that experience was. It was in compelling dishonest lawyers to disgorge that which they had taken in violation of the statutes from the pensioners by fraud and misrepresentation of facts. In one case the lawyer had procured nearly a thousand dollars for a penniless, ignorant widow, who, as I now recollect, could neither read nor write. He got her to indorse the voucher for the claim, representing that he would obtain the money and give it to her. He did get the money, but he put every dollar of it in his own pocket. I say it is not safe or wise to permit such men to have unlimited scope with the ignorant in matters of this character.

In another case a member of the bar recovered several hundred dollars, and took over $75 of it for his services. I succeeded by a proceeding for contempt in compelling him to turn it over to the parties to whom it belonged upon penalty of being disbarred. That is my experience. As we learn from the Pension Office, you can find numerous cases of similar practice in different parts of the country.

During the present session of Congress the atmosphere here in Washington has been filled with the charges that corrupt and dishonest practices have been engaged in by parties in pension cases under the law now in force.

I say, therefore, that while I have the highest regard and the utmost respect for the distinguished Committee on Appropriations, I believe if the House will join with the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay and permit us to mature the bill which we now have under consideration we will be able to prepare sound and conservative legislation such as members will be able to indorse, legislation thoroughly matured and acceptable to this body. Therefore I say again that at the proper time I shall ask this House to join me and that committee in striking from this bill the second section, which in my judgment never had any business on an appropriation bill, but ought to have been left to the committee which had been intrusted by this House with the duty of preparing competent and conservative legislation upon this matter.

I believe I have now said all that I had desired to say on this subject. In closing permit me to thank my friends on both sides of the House for the attention and consideration they have yielded to me while I have been discussing this bill. I now yield to my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] what time he may need.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think five minutes will be all that I shall desire.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I yield five minutes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] has stated so well and fully the objections to the second section of this bill that there remains very little to be said.

There are evils connected with our present pension system, and especially with the system of claim agents. It is well known that there are in the city of Washington claim agents who have made it their business, under the law as it now exists, to collect two, three, or five dollars—as much as they could—from a claimant; who, after having sent circulars to thousands of persons and obtained money from them in that way, have abandoned the claims entirely, and the claimants have no recourse except to come to members of Congress. For that reason mainly the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay agree that fees in such cases should be collected only after the claim has been prosecuted to a successful termination.

This section of the bill proposes, however, as my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] has explained, to limit the fees in cases where the claims of officers are involved. I think that is carrying it quite too far. The Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay have thought that in certain cases, in fact in all that class of cases which include arrears of pensions from the date of the discharge, the claimant ought to be permitted to enter into an agreement with his attorney, in order that he might be able to obtain competent attorneys to prosecute his claim, for a fee not exceeding $25, to be approved by the Commissioner of Pensions.

In the case of claims involving only an increase of pension, or a pension without arrears, I think the fee of $10 is quite enough. The fee should be allowed to stand as it now is in all that class of cases. As the committee to which I referred has substantially matured a bill embracing these features, which it will probably be ready to report to the House after to-morrow, I agree with my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], and with other gentlemen who have spoken on this question, that this second section ought to go out of this bill. At any rate it ought to be modified before it is allowed to pass the House. I believe that is all I wish to say.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio on the other side of the House [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HANCOCK. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invaiid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

ARMAMENT FOR FORTIFICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The condition of our seacoast defenses, and their armament, has been brought to the attention of Congress in my annual messages, and I now submit a special estimate of the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, transmitted by the Secretary of War, for a permanent annual appropriation of $1,500,000 to provide the necessary armament for our fortifications.

This estimate is founded upon the report of the gun-foundery board, recently transmitted, to which I have heretofore invited the early attention of Congress.

In presenting this estimate I do not think it necessary to enumerate the considerations which make it of the highest importance that there should be no unnecessary delay in entering upon the work, which must be commensurate with the public interests to be guarded and which will take much time.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 11, 1884.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LEWIS, for fifteen days.

To Mr. NICHOLLS, for two weeks from Monday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. BREWER, of New York, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. COVINGTON, for four days, beginning Monday, the 14th instant.

To Mr. ROGERS, of New York, from the 12th to the 21st instant, on account of important business.

To Mr. BROADHEAD, until the 26th instant, on account of important business.

To Mr. TALBOTT, until Monday next.

FREE HOMES FOR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. WELLER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial and joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa relative to free homes for all surviving soldiers and sailors of the Union Army.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution is as follows:

[Joint resolution No. 11.]

Memorial and joint resolution relative to free homes for all surviving soldiers and sailors of the Union Army.

Whereas under the provisions of the homestead laws of Congress it is impossible for many of the soldiers and sailors of the late war to avail themselves of the provisions of said law, by reason of ill-health, caused by injuries and disease, received and contracted while in the service of their country, and for want of means to locate and improve homesteads as required by law; and

Whereas there is yet belonging to the United States Government enough land to give every soldier and sailor a home without detriment to the public interest: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their utmost endeavors to secure the passage of a law, at this session of Congress, giving to every honorably discharged soldier and sailor of the late war a patent for one hundred and sixty acres of the public land as a home, without requiring them to settle thereon, and that the title thereto be made non-transferable, or with such conditions attached as will secure to the soldier or sailor, or their families, all the benefits of such grant, and debar the speculator from procuring and holding the same for speculative purposes; and, further, that such homesteads be exempt from taxation for ten years, and also be exempt from all debts contracted or incurred by such soldiers and sailors for a like period.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved March 29, 1884.

STATE OF IOWA, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the original joint resolution on file in this office.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the State, this — day of April, A. D. 1884.

[SEAL.] J. A. T. HULL, Secretary of State,
W. T. HAMMOND, Deputy.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SURVIVORS OF CONFEDERATE MILITARY PRISONS.

Mr. WELLER. I also ask unanimous consent that a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa relative to certain prisoners of the war of the rebellion being placed on the pension-rolls be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection. The resolution is as follows:

[Joint resolution No. 12.]

A memorial to Congress asking that certain prisoners of the war of the rebellion be placed on the pension-rolls.

Whereas many officers, soldiers, and sailors of the Federal Army and Navy were confined in so-called Confederate prisons for an unusual length of time, suffering great hardships and contracting disease hard and difficult to prove under existing pension laws; and

Whereas Hon. JAMES S. ROBINSON, of Ohio, has introduced in the Forty-eighth Congress a bill (No. 1189) "granting pensions to all soldiers, sailors, and marines who, while in the service of the United States, and while in the line of their duty, were taken prisoners, and as such confined in the so-called confederate prisons between the 1st day of May, 1861, and the 1st day of May, 1865," as follows: "All who were prisoners of war two months, and less than six months, one-half pension; those who were prisoners of war six months, and less than twelve months, a three-fourths pension; and all such as were prisoners of war twelve months, and more than twelve months, a total pension. And, furthermore, such surviving prisoners of war shall receive $2 per day for each day and every day's confinement in said confederate military prisons: Provided, That such pension shall in each case begin from the date of the passage of this act, and shall be paid at the same time and in the same manner as other pensions are now paid; And provided further, That this act shall not entitle any person to draw more than one pension, but that such survivors of the so-called confederate military prisons as are entitled and are receiving a pension at the time of the passage of this act shall be entitled to the increase of their pension which this act may grant them:" Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Representatives in Congress be requested, and Senators therein instructed, to use their best endeavors to secure the passage of an act by Congress in accordance with the provisions of said Robinson bill, No. 1189.

Approved March 29, 1884.

STATE OF IOWA, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the original joint resolution on file in this office.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the State, this—day of April, A. D. 1884.

J. A. T. HULL, Secretary of State,
W. T. HAMMOND, Deputy.

The joint resolution was referred to the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. WELLER. I also ask unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of a petition in regard to the eight-hour law. I do not ask for the printing of the names, but merely for the printing of the attesting name.

There was no objection.

The petition is as follows:

Petition for the enforcement of the eight-hour law and to pay to employés of the Government wages hitherto withheld in violation of the "eight-hour law."

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your petitioners respectfully represent that they are laborers, workmen, or mechanics who now are or who have been employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States subsequent to the 19th day of May, 1869. That on the 25th day of June, 1868, the following became the law of the land:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics now employed, or who may be hereafter employed, by or on behalf of the Government of the United States; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed."—Fifteenth Statutes at Large, 77.

Your petitioners further show that on the 19th day of May, 1869, U. S. Grant, then President of the United States, issued a proclamation from which the following extract is taken:

"Whereas the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, constituted on and after that date eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, and repealed all acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith:

"Now, therefore I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby direct that from and after this date no reduction shall be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of such reduction of the hours of labor."—Sixteenth Statutes at Large, 1127.

Your petitioners further show that on the 11th day of May, 1872, the President of the United States issued another proclamation, of which the following is an extract, to wit:

"Whereas the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, constitued on and after that date eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by and on behalf of the Government of the United States; and

"Whereas on the 19th day of May, in the year 1869, by Executive proclamation it was directed that from and after that date no reduction should be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of such reduction of the hours of labor; and

"Whereas it is now represented to me that the act of Congress and the proclamation aforesaid have not been strictly observed by all the officers of the Government having charge of such laborers, workmen, and mechanics:

"Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby again call attention to the act of Congress aforesaid, and direct all officers of the executive department of the Government having charge of the employment and payment of laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States to make no reduction in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of the reduction of the hours of labor."—Seventeenth Statutes at Large, 955.

And your petitioners further show that the Congress of the United States passed an act, approved on the 18th day of May, 1872, the second section of which is as follows:

"That the proper accounting officers be, and hereby are, authorized and required in the settlement of all accounts for the services of laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, between the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, and the 19th day of May, 1869, the date of the proclamation of the President concerning such pay, to settle and pay for the same without reduction on account of reduction of hours of labor by said act, when it shall be made to appear that such was the sole cause of the reduction of wages; and a sufficient sum for said purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."—Seventeenth Statutes at Large, 134.

And your petitioners further show that notwithstanding the plain letter and spirit of the eight-hour law, and notwithstanding the Presidential proclamations enforcing it, and notwithstanding the interpretation given to the law by the act of Congress last quoted, which your petitioners are advised by counsel is binding upon all executive and judicial officers, your petitioners have been compelled to work ten hours for a day's work under penalty of dismissal or a reduction of their daily wages of 20 per cent. in case they worked but eight hours for a day's work.

The following order will show how and upon what authority the eight-hour law which is now enforced was violated for six months in each year for six years:

[General Order No. 227.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 30, 1877.

The following decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is published for the information of the Navy:

* * * * * * * *

Under this construction of the law regulating public labor given by the Supreme Court of the United States, the Department has fixed the rate of labor for mechanics, foremen, leading-men, and laborers on the basis of ten hours a day. All workmen electing to labor only eight hours per day will receive a proportionate reduction of their wages.

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

The above order was issued by the honorable Secretary of the Navy upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, No. 401, October term, 1876, The United States, appellants, vs. Arthur Martin.

The judicial action is reported in the case of Martin vs. United States, 4 Otto, 400. The Martin case had no merit in it. Martin worked under a special contract, was paid extra wages, then made claim under the act of May 18, 1872.

His claim was adjusted. The amount found due under that act was paid and he gave a receipt in full, which relieved the Government of any further indebtedness.

The above order was enforced at the navy-yard, League Island, Pa., by the commandant, as shown by the following, a similar order being issued at each of the other navy-yards:

[Circular.]

COMMANDANT'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD,
League Island, July 7, 1877.

The following will be the working hours at this yard under the ten-hour rule:

Until otherwise ordered the hours of labor at this yard will be from 8 a. m. until 12 m., and from 1 to 5 o'clock p. m. This to go in to effect on Monday next, the 26th instant.

E. SIMPSON, Commodore, Commandant.

The eight-hour law has been violated from on or about June, 1877, to March 26, 1883, since which time it has been enforced, under orders of the Hon. William E. Chandler, Secretary of the Navy, of that date, and is now in operation at all navy-yards; and that from August 25 to September 19, 1883, while the U. S. S. Ossipee was on Cramp & Son's dry-dock, in Philadelphia, Pa., undergoing repairs, the employés were worked ten hours per day, and received one and a quarter days' wages for ten hours' work, thereby carrying out the law as passed by Congress June 25, 1868.

We would also state that during the time that the law was violated the employés were paid the same rate of wages for eight hours' work as they received for ten hours' work.

As to the War Department, we would state that the "eight-hour law" has been violated in the same manner as in the Navy Department. The employés of arsenals at Benicia, Cal., Rock Island, Ill., and Frankford, Philadelphia, Pa., petitioned the Hon. Robert T. Lincoln, Secretary of War, several months ago to enforce the law, and the following order was promulgated at Frankford arsenal, viz:

[Post Order No. 3.]

THE FRANKFORD ARSENAL, January 8, 1884.

I. In accordance with the decision of the Secretary of War, dated January 3, 1884, the working hours of this arsenal will, on and after the 9th instant, be as follows for all days of the week: From 8 a. m. until 12 o'clock noon, and from 12.30 until 4.30 o'clock p. m.

II. The officers in charge of shops will prepare and submit for approval of the commanding officer detailed regulations regarding signals for beginning and stopping work, roll-calls, &c.

By command of Maj. S. C. Lyford:

Official:

FRANK BAKER,
Lieutenant of Ordnance, Post Adjutant.

At the arsenals at Benicia, Cal., Rock Island, Ill., and other posts under the immediate charge of the War Department, the employés are compelled to work nine and ten hours per day, while at the arsenal at Frankford, Philadelphia, Pa., the employés are receiving the benefit of the eight-hour law, by order of the Hon. Robert T. Lincoln, Secretary of War, dated January 3, 1884.

Your petitioners therefore pray that a law be enacted directing and requiring your petitioners to be paid for the extra work which they have performed in excess of eight hours per day since the act quoted above provided for paying the workmen up to the 19th day of May, 1869, and appropriating the money to make said payments. And your petitioners further pray that such penal laws may be enacted as will for the future compel the administrative officers of the Government to respect the rights of labor under the eight-hour law.

Respectfully submitted by

J. M. DAVIS,
Representative of Petitioners.

106 RICHMOND STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Labor.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I am instructed by the committee to report back a resolution of inquiry, together with a substitute, and to recommend that the substitute be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The original resolution will be read, and then the proposed substitute.

The original resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to furnish to this House copies of all orders, reports, recommendations, correspondence, and other papers on file in the Treasury Department relating to the purchase of a site for a public building in the city of Brooklyn and State of New York.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Whereas a resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds relative to the purchase of a site for a public building in Brooklyn, N. Y.; and

Whereas at a hearing before said committee specific charges were made, in writing, and filed with said committee, alleging complicity between some of the officers of the Government and the owners of real estate in said city, whereby it is alleged that the Government is likely to be required to pay an exorbitant price for the contemplated site; and

Whereas it is due to the Government as well as to the officers implicated that the facts should be ascertained: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is requested to furnish to this House copies of all orders, reports, recommendations, correspondence, and other papers on file relative to the purchase or contemplated purchase of a site for a public building in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., and that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to investigate the charges made, with power to send for persons and papers; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to suspend negotiations for the purchase of said property pending the investigation.

Mr. BEACH. I object to the consideration of that resolution at this time. We should not undertake to pass a resolution of that kind within thirty seconds of the time for taking a recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this substitute is something more than a resolution calling for information from the head of a Department. It proposes to authorize the committee to send for persons and papers and to make an investigation.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. It is a substitute for a resolution calling for executive information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman can not, as a privileged matter, report back a resolution calling for executive information together with a substitute for an entirely different purpose.

Mr. BEACH. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, pursuant to an order of the House heretofore made, the Chair declares the House in recess until 7½ o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 7.30 p. m.

The Clerk read the following:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 11, 1884.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk of the House of Representatives:

Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN is hereby designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at this evening session.

J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). The Clerk will read the order of business for this evening session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business under the order of the House just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering pension bills on the Private Calendar.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1073) granting a pension to William J. Lee.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that this bill and all other bills down to the one for the relief of Walter Dickson, on page 28 of the Calendar, be passed over informally for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has heard the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON]. If there be no objection it will be ordered accordingly.

There was no objection.

WALTER DICKSON.

The bill (H. R. 2017) granting a pension to Walter Dickson was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Walter Dickson, formerly of Company G, One hundred and forty-fourth New York Volunteer Infantry.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions was to insert, after the word "formerly," the word "sergeant;" so that it will read "formerly sergeant of Company G," &c.

The report (by Mr. HOLMES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2017) granting a pension to Walter Dickson, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Walter Dickson entered service as sergeant of Company G, One hundred and forty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry. He enlisted August 26, 1862, and was discharged June 5, 1865. He applied for pension to the Commissioner of Pensions, but his claim was rejected on the ground that proof was not sufficient. He was required to furnish proof of his regimental surgeon as to disability and acquired asthma, and although he had abundance of other proof, substantially covering the case, his claim was rejected, it appears, from want of proof on the part of the surgeon of his regiment. The record in the case shows that Walter Dickson was in every respect a sound man when he entered the service. As will be seen, claimant was in the service nearly three years. During the time of his enlistment he acquired asthma, resulting from fever contracted in July, 1863, while on the march from Gettysburg, Pa., in pursuit of the enemy; that his fever had troubled him, and, following this, terminated in asthma; this prior to his discharge from the service.

He was honorably discharged and mustered out with his company as second lieutenant June 25, 1865.

Capt. F. B. Hart testifies that he was captain of claimant's said Company G; that he was personally acquainted with Walter Dickson, of said company; that at some time in 1863 said Dickson contracted asthma from exposure incident to the duties of a soldier, and that such disability kept growing upon him with more severity until he was mustered out of service; and says that he knows that said Dickson was sound at time of enlistment.

Edgar A. Vermilyea testifies he entered the service of the United States, One hundred and forty-fourth New York Volunteers, in September, 1862, as an orderly sergeant of the company, and was promoted to second lieutenant in May, 1863. He was well acquainted with Walter Dickson, who was sergeant of said Company G, and that said Dickson's health in first year of said service was good.

Dr. H. W. Smith, of Garner, Iowa, testifies that he has been acquainted with the soldier three years and a half, and during that time has acted as claimant's family physician; that claimant was afflicted with asthma of a dyspeptic character, which in the physician's opinion was caused by malarial fever; that his attacks begin with great drowsiness. In respiration the ribs and shoulders raise to their utmost extent. The physician's treatment has extended over a period of three years and a half; and further states that claimant's condition unfits him for manual labor of any amount.

J. H. Barker, M. D., Samuel Hart, M. D., testify that the claimant is suffering with asthma, and has done so for some years. The last-named physician says he suffers to such an extent as to unfit him for manual labor.

J. S. Hurd, M. D., examining surgeon, says, in his certificate:

"Claimant was taken with fever while on the march after Lee's army from Gettysburg, in the month of July, 1863, and had cough from that time. Asthmatic symptoms first showed themselves at Folly Island, South Carolina, after a cold caught while crossing from Folly Island to James Island, some time in January, 1864; has had frequent asthmatic attacks, increasing in severity, since then. Since October, 1870, he has been unable to remain the whole of a single night in bed, being forced to pass the latter part of the night in a chair on account of difficulty in breathing; and is considerably emaciated."

The only proof whatever that can be said to be omitted is that of his regimental surgeon, who does not recollect his case, but as against this the report of the assistant adjutant-general of the War Department shows that in July, 1863, claimant was in general hospital, which bears out the statement of the claimant and his other witnesses as to the inception of his disease.

It is shown by the certificate of the surgeon that Dickson was sound when he enlisted, by that of the assistant surgeon that he was in perfect health and qualified for a soldier. The evidence of numerous neighbors and physicians as to his condition since the war is on record; of two others as to having asthma in the service, one of whom nursed him in the Army, together with the affidavit of Captain Hart, who says Dickson contracted asthma by exposure incident to the duties of a soldier, which kept growing upon him with more or less severity until he was mustered out of the service. Other witnesses show the contracting of asthma from the time he was mustered out until the present.

It also appears that he was wounded at the battle of Shiloh and lost the index finger of his left hand, so shattering the finger as to render amputation necessary. The same was amputated close to the knuckle. It further appears that the claimant Dickson is very poor, and is an extreme sufferer from the malady complained of.

Your committee think it a proper case for relief, and the statements of distinguished citizens who are acquainted with the claimant bear uniform witness to his character, integrity, and standing as a good citizen.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment inserting the name of "sergeant" in the sixth line, after the word "formerly," subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to inquire why it was that the name of this man was not put on the pension-roll by the Pension Bureau.

Mr. HOLMES. The application in this case was rejected solely on account of the failure of the regimental surgeon to remember the case. The want of his testimony, however, is amply supplied by that of other witnesses, the members of his company, his neighbors, and his attending physician, amply showing that the disability originated in the Army during the service of this man. Indeed there is nothing wanting in the testimony, and I was myself surprised that the claim was rejected by the Pension Office. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has carefully examined the claim, and there certainly is no lack of evidence as to the disease having been contracted while in the service.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Do the proofs show that this man received the benefit of the treatment of his regimental surgeon or assistant surgeon?

Mr. HOLMES. They do. The surgeon's record shows that this man was in hospital in 1863, at the time that he asserts the disability was incurred; the record bears out his statement. The statement of the regimental surgeon is simply that he does not remember the case. They were then on the march, and no particular record was kept at that time.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then, Mr. Chairman, this is simply a case of appeal from the Pension Bureau to Congress. There is nothing technical in the case. If the report presents correctly, as I have no doubt it does, the facts, it clearly appears that this pension ought to have been granted by the Pension Bureau under the general law.

Mr. HOLMES. It should, we think, have been granted under the general law; but this is like thousands of other cases which come before Congress, which are equitable in their nature and upon which the House acts in order to do equity.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. This does not present any case of equity It presents a case of legal right; because if this soldier contracted while in the service the disease which now disables him, he is entitled, not upon equitable grounds but as a matter of legal right, to a pension. I do not wish to oppose the bill, but merely to point out that this is one of those cases which present a mere appeal from the Pension Office to Congress.

Mr. HOLMES. It is a requirement of the Pension Office, in cases of this kind, that the evidence of the regimental surgeon shall be produced.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. There is no law that requires that.

Mr. HOLMES. But it is a rule of the Pension Office. The absence of such testimony from the regimental surgeon is in this case amply supplied by other evidence covering the whole ground.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this case seems to be one of a large class, in which there has been service and where, according to the report in this case (which I do not doubt is worthy of credit), there is present disability; but after the lapse of twenty years there is great difficulty in obtaining the evidence necessary to connect this disability with the service in such a manner as to show the time, place, and circumstances in which the disability was contracted and its continuance from that period to the present. If such proof could be presented in this case, the applicant would be entitled under the law to arrears. Not being able to do that, but showing present disability, he asks for a pension to date from the passage of the act.

Now, as I have said, there is a large class of cases of this kind. I think the complaints about pensions arise very largely in cases of this nature. If the House should see fit to pass a bill which has been reported by the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, I believe cases of this kind will all be removed from the consideration of this House. I have no doubt, from the report, that this is a case in which relief ought to be granted; but instead of being granted in this way—though I make no objection to this particular bill—I think there ought to be relief for this class of cases under a general law, which I trust will be speedily passed.

The question being taken on the amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

AMANDA CUTTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3188) granting a pension to Amanda Cutter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amanda Cutter, mother of J. Henry Cutter, formerly a private in Company C, Thirty-second Regiment of Iowa Infantry Volunteers, said pension to be at the rate of $8 per month, and to commence on the 30th day of March, 1867.

The following amendment, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was read:

Strike out at the end of the bill all after the word "volunteers," and insert "to commence from and after the passage of this act."

The report (by Mr. HOLMES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3188) granting a pension to Amanda Cutter, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to make the following report:

Amanda Cutter, the claimant, is the widowed mother of J. Henry Cutter, who was a sergeant in Company C, Thirty-second Regiment Iowa Volunteers. He enlisted August 14, 1862, was mustered in the same date, and discharged December 21, 1863. He died March 30, 1867.

The said soldier left no child or children, but a widow, named Rosetta Cooper, who remained his widow until 1874, when she remarried, and is now the wife of one Harry Hurst, of Waterloo, Iowa. The son remained unmarried while he was in the service, and until August 17, 1864. The evidence shows that the petitioner, the widowed mother and claimant, was dependent on this son for support; that her husband, Moses Cutter, was 64 years old at the date of his decease; was an invalid and unable to earn any support for himself or his family for a year preceding his death, and for several years before that time was able to do but little work; that said Moses Cutter, the father of the deceased soldier, left surviving him two sons and one daughter; that the other son, Dexter B. Cutter, enlisted in May, 1861, in the Iowa Infantry, and served three years, received an honorable discharge, and re-enlisted in Hancock's Corps, where he served another year, and then returned home, dying February 14, 1870; that the remaining child, Charlotte Lovejoy, died on or about February 20, 1863; that the widowed mother is alone and childless. The only property of the claimant herein is a small house and lot, which she owns and occupies, worth from $150 to $200, and has no means of support other than that she is able to obtain by labor.

On December 22, 1879, she applied for a pension as dependent mother, on account of her son, J. Henry Cutter, he having died of disease and disability incurred in the service, as shown by record and proofs. Her claim was rejected by the Pension Office in January, 1882, on the ground that the soldier left a widow surviving him, that the medical and other evidence presented showed that the soldier, J. Henry Cutter, suffered from chronic inflammation of the lungs, of which he finally died. While in the service he had the measles, while in camp at Dubuque, Iowa, and had never been well since that time.

There would seem to be no reasonable doubt from the evidence that the soldier on whose account this claim is made incurred the disability from which he died while in the Army and in the line of duty; also that his widowed mother is now very old, without any living children, and in very destitute circumstances. The only point raised by the Pension Office was that he left a widow surviving him. This wife has signed a written declination and waiver of all rights in favor of the widowed mother. If the mother was dependent on the soldier, as would appear, we can not think that justice should permit any technical rule under the pension laws to defeat her, because the soldier left surviving him a wife whom he married after he came out of the service, and who makes no claim whatever, but files an express waiver.

Your committee, therefore, recommend that the claimant, Amanda Cutter, be placed upon the pension-rolls by the Secretary of the Interior, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, from and after the passage of this act, and that with the bill so amended the same be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do not know that I have any objection to the amendment; but I wish to say that this bill is simply a new departure. There is not any technical reason why the applicant in this case was not put on the pension-roll; the law very plainly excluded her. The law excludes the dependent mother or father in any case when the soldier left a widow or minor children. In this case the soldier left a widow; and I suppose that widow drew a pension until she remarried, as I presume she did, although the fact is not stated in the report. Upon her remarriage, it seems, she relinquished all right to the pension; but she had no right to relinquish.

Mr. HOLMES. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that this widow never drew a pension. She never applied for one. She makes an express waiver in favor of the widowed mother. If the widowed mother has any right as a dependent mother they could not be cut off by a marriage, after the services had been rendered by the soldier, and especially where the widow of the soldier had waived all her rights in favor of the widowed mother. The Government has never paid anything to the widow of the soldier.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The waiver on the part of the widow does not amount to anything.

Mr. HOLMES. But the remarriage on the part of the widow makes a perpetual waiver.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. To pass this bill puts on the pension-roll a new class of persons by special favor. If that class ought to go on the pension-roll all ought to go, and it is unfair to select out one and pass a special bill for that one case, leaving all the others unprovided for. If we pass this bill we ought to pass a general bill providing for all like cases.

Mr. HOLMES. I will say, for the information of the gentleman from Alabama, that this is such a case as we pass on every day. There is no difference between this and other cases, except a mere technical difference, which in effect amounts to nothing, and it is that this man had married and left a widow, but that widow, as I have already said, has waived all her rights in favor of the widowed mother. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection to the bill, because it is as good and worthy a one as has passed the House during this session.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, the only ground for granting this pension is that of sympathy for this old lady. The objection which may be brought against this bill will go further than that she is not in the line of receiving a pension, there being a life intermediate, that of the widow. When you come to look at the report you will see that the soldier was in the service only one year, that he enlisted in 1862 and was mustered out in 1863. There is not a scintilla of evidence indicated by the report which would lead us to believe that he incurred any disability in the line of duty or service which ultimately terminated in his death. While in the Army he was unmarried, and he remained so for some time after he was mustered out. He was married a year when he died. The only disease referred to is that he had measles while he was in the Army. There is no pretense that he was wounded in the service.

There is no man perhaps within the sound of my voice who has not had the experience of having the measles. It is alleged in this case that the measles resulted in inflammation of the lungs. It is exceptional that measles ever results in any chronic disease of the lungs. Chronic inflammation of the lungs I believe does not exist for the length of time which it necessarily would have existed in this case if it were the outcome of the attack of measles in 1862 or 1863, as the patient lived five or six years thereafter.

There would be no objection made to granting the pension in this case if the soldier died from disease occasioned by exposure in the Army or from wounds received in the line of duty. I think that is as far as we ought to go. The officer in the Pension Bureau having the question to pass on of course declined to grant the pension in this case from the fact that the soldier left surviving him a widow, and that of itself was sufficient without reference to any other fact. My sympathy goes out to the same extent to the unfortunate of my fellow-citizens as that of other gentlemen, and I should be willing to join in doing something in behalf of this old lady if I could find any just ground for my action.

I do not believe she is so impoverished as they would have us believe. She seems to be the owner of realty to the extent of one or two hundred dollars a year. She is better off, I understand, to-day in her circumstances than a considerable portion of the people throughout the country. I do not believe we should suffer our sympathies to carry us beyond the line of consistent propriety in the discharge of our duties in this House. I do hope that this Committee on Invalid Pensions, with the assistance they can marshal in this House on part of the members on this floor, will do what is right and just, and will not attempt to force this bill through at this time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I agree with my friend from New York [Mr. VAN ALSTYNE] with reference to the principle involved in this bill. Would the House be willing to extend the pension laws so as to include all dependent parents whatever, whether their sons left widows or minor children or not? If it would be, then it would include this class But if it would not, then I do not think this case ought to be taken out from a class and be given the benefit of a special act, when there is a considerable class occupying precisely the same position.

This, Mr. Chairman, is an extension of the pension laws; and is it such an extension as it is desirable to make? I do not think it is. I do not think we can afford to go that far. I do not think it is in accordance with a safe public policy to go beyond parents, who would have the right to demand the assistance of their sons, were they living, for their support. In granting pensions it seems to me that is the clear line to be drawn.

Mr. ROWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. ROWELL. Would not this mother, by the law, have the right to be supported by this son, although he was married, if she became dependent?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That depends upon the statute law of the particular State. She would not under the common law. Besides, this mother, I understand from the report of the committee, has property of her own. But whether she would be entitled in the State of Iowa, in which I believe this case arises, to call upon her son for support, or whether he would be legally bound for her support or not, I do not know; but if it is proposed to extend the provisions of the pension laws to that class, I repeat it should be extended to all of them, and not to a single one by a special act.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, it is well known, I suppose, to the House that under the rules of law governing the allowance of pensions this woman could not obtain a pension. Nobody pretends that she could. This bill proposes to give her a pension outside of and beyond the law because of the equities of the case. When gentlemen say that they propose to adhere rigidly to the administration of the law in deciding these cases, and are unwilling to go a step beyond that, they lay down a harsh rule which will do great injustice in very many cases. If the Committee on Invalid Pensions has any right and proper conception of its duties, one of the very first rules by which we have been guided and influenced in our actions is to be governed by the principle of doing justice in these cases where justice can not be done by the law by reason of its universality, applying the rule out of which equity itself grows.

Applying the rule, then, which guided us in our deliberations in all such cases, the committee are constrained to believe that a case is presented here involving peculiar merit. Now, this woman is shown to have been the mother of two sons, both now dead, and both of them having served their country in the last war. These were the only sons that she had. These were the only persons upon whom she could lean in her old age, and to whom she could have looked for support had they lived.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let me ask the gentleman, were they killed in the service?

Mr. MATSON. One of them served for a period of three years, the other one for a year and four months. And now we thought, after a hearing of all of these facts, that notwithstanding one of the sons had married after he came out of the service, although the mother was dependent upon him during the time he was a soldier, and if he had been killed during the war would have obtained the pension—and notwithstanding that after returning home he married, but continued to contribute to the support of his mother, and his widow never applied for a pension, the Government never having been called upon for a single dollar because of the death of this soldier, we thought under all these circumstances that it was no more than right and proper to give this old woman who had given her two sons to her country in the hour of her country's trial a pension to relieve her of her absolute necessities.

Why, the gentleman from Ohio says that she has real estate. The report shows that she has real estate to the value of $150 or $200, and nothing else; merely a little, poor, simple home, in which she can find shelter; no means of support, and very old.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. How old is she?

Mr. MATSON. Seventy-one years of age. As old as you; perhaps older. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Another question: What was the length of the enlistment of this son in the Army?

Mr. MATSON. One year and four months.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. How did he become discharged from the service?

Mr. MATSON. I suppose on account of disease contracted in the Army.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Measles.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman says measles, and that it is a very common and insignificant disease.

Why, my observation, and experience too, is that a man never had the measles, or a woman either, after they became grown, without the disease leaving in almost every instance very serious results. It is a slight disease with children, but with grown people it is a very serious one; and instead of inferring that simply because the soldier had the measles no serious results followed, the very reverse is likely to be the case. But the fact is stated here, and stated, too, upon a fair and full investigation of the case, that this result followed, and that the soldier died because of the disease he contracted in the service.

And now will this House refuse to give this old woman a pension under the circumstances? My friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] says it is going a step beyond the law. Of course it is. But I think the very first opportunity he had this evening he took occasion to say that he proposes to push the law even a step further——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. MATSON. That he proposes to pension all the soldiers that are disabled. That he proposes to pass a bill under which nearly all the bills we are called upon to consider will be taken out of the House. Am I right or not?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. You are not quite right.

Mr. MATSON. How far am I wrong?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. You are wrong in this: that it is not the purpose to extend the law to include any classes that are not pensionable now, but only to remove the difficulties in the way of evidence, so as to enable those who are disabled to obtain pensions to which they are entitled, not to extend the provisions of the law to include any classes not now included.

Mr. MATSON. I think I have not misstated the gentleman's proposition. I understood him to say he proposed to extend the law in relation to pensions so as to include more persons—and so I still understand him—so as to include those who have a present disability and can not prove the disability originated in the service.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. To cover persons who, at this distance of time, are unable to provide the evidence necessary to show that they are entitled to a pension.

Mr. MATSON. Yes; and I approve of all that. But would it be more right to extend the law to that class of soldiers than to pension this old woman under the circumstances?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then would my friend agree to extend the provisions of the pension law so as to include all dependent parents?

Mr. MATSON. I would have it include all such dependent mothers as this. I should, most emphatically.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not say the gentleman is not right in that.

Mr. MATSON. But we are not here now for the purpose of making general laws. The committee and the House must take each case as they find it. Here is a case which I believe is a good one and ought to pass. I have no fault to find with other gentlemen who form a different judgment about it. But I do insist we can not afford to be governed by the iron rules of the law in determining upon these particular cases, but that we must be governed by the equities, by the right of each particular case.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This is somebody's mother that we are speaking about. This is the mother of an Iowa soldier. She reared him for the service of the Republic. She took care of this man as the Government never could employ any one to take care of a man to bring him to the years of manhood to make him such a man as every soldier should be. And when the time came that the country called, she gave him as a free-will offering. She did not count the cost although her heart went with her great gift. She gave all she had when she gave her boy. She watched him through all the vicissitudes of army life. Years hurried upon her while her boy was gone. She read his letters when he was well, and rejoiced with him in his pride of life. She read them when he was sick and cheered him with a mother's love; she shared all his hopes and enlarged them, and shared his dejection and lessened it. She encouraged him as only a mother can. She was his first friend, his truest counselor, his best advocate. America had mothers when her great trial came and her sons were worthy of them. We should deal generously with them when they come here asking us to take the place of their lost boys. We should speak reverently and in subdued voices of their needs, and look respectfully when the House is honored with the presence of their tottering feet.

Young people can not rightly and fully value a mother. It requires mature manhood to thoroughly and completely appreciate a good mother. The question with us to-night is whether we appreciate this mother, this Iowa mother.

It has been remarked that it is doubtful whether indeed this soldier had received in the service the disabilities that attached to him when he came home from the war. I never saw an old soldier who was not more or less disabled constitutionally by his army life. There is some disability which always attaches itself to him. Thousands of them in Iowa are too proud to ask for any help. Thousands of the old mothers are too proud to ask for assistance until they are reduced down to the condition of this mother who has only $150 in the world. You see, she, like the woman in the Savior's days, gave all she had. Those heroic people, mothers and sons, are all passing quickly away. A few years and the pension-rolls will gradually fade until the cemeteries contain the last of that generation, but of our great abundance let us not refuse the necessities of life to any that ask.

Now, sir, we can make an exception here to general rules and bureau regulations. It may not be wise to make a general law pensioning women of this condition in every case. But we can certainly make an exception. When my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] was speaking on this question to-night I was reminded that I have had letters from old Mexican soldiers in Iowa asking what HEWITT of Alabama looked like; the man who made a whole night's fight at the head of this House to pension old Mexican soldiers—what does he look like? I have written in answer saying he is a tall, broad, fine-looking fellow, that HEWITT of Alabama. [Laughter.] He has got a heart in him and he has got a soul in him. He thinks of the benefits that came to the United States in the grand acquisitions through the fight made by the United States with Mexico to get those Pacific Territories; and he appreciates the work done by those old soldiers who went there and glorified the Republic in those days. That is the kind of a man HEWITT of Alabama is.

I want him to strike from the RECORD some of the remarks he has made to-night, because I do not want these old soldiers in Iowa to ask me questions in another strain about "HEWITT of Alabama."

Mr. HOLMES. One word in answer to the remarks of the gentleman as to the matter of disability. I am sure that no gentleman will interpose any objection to this case if he fully understands it. I can readily see why they should want light on this matter. But it is a case where the disability of the soldier is clearly proven, from the time that he had the measles and exhibited the first symptoms of consumption down to the time of his death. We did not think it worth while to refer to that in the report, but the evidence shows it clearly.

The pension would have been granted by the Pension Office had it not been that the applicant had since married a wife. The old mother is a widow, has never remarried, and is a dependent mother, just as she was at first. She is not to blame for the son's marrying, nor did his marrying take away the right of the son to support her.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] suggests that that depends upon the laws of the particular State. It does not seem to me that that is relevant to this question at all. But I might say in answer to it that the law of Iowa provides that a man shall take care of his dependent mother. That is a wholesome law, and it should be the law of every State, and if there is any State in which that is not the law, all I can say is that I pity the State and its people.

This woman gave her two sons to the country—all the sons she had. They both served in the Army, and they both died. She has made every sacrifice that she could make, and it does not seem to be equitable that opposition should be made to the pensioning of an old lady like this, who is 70 years old, while we are pensioning the widows of general officers at the rate of $50 a month, who, to say the least, had a reasonable compensation while they lived.

It is cruel, and would be unjust in Representatives of this Congress, to deny to an old lady—one to whom, of all beings on the earth, our sympathies should go out—this small pittance, an old lady who brought these young men into being, nurtured, and took care of them, and finally gave them up as sacrifices for the preservation of the country. I trust earnestly that gentlemen will not seriously make any opposition to this bill.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMES. With pleasure.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Is this claimant in your district?

Mr. HOLMES. She is not.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Have you any personal knowledge of the case?

Mr. HOLMES. I have not; the bill was introduced by another gentleman from another district.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Was this soldier discharged from the service on account of physical disability?

Mr. HOLMES. I understand that he was.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Have you any knowledge upon that subject?

Mr. HOLMES. I can not make a positive statement about it. It is some time since this case was examined, but my recollection is that he was discharged before the close of the war on account of disability incurred in the service.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Was he a volunteer or a drafted man?

Mr. HOLMES. He was a volunteer. Drafted men did not come from that section of the country; they were men of different mettle.

The question was taken upon the amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and it was agreed to.

The question was taken upon laying aside the bill as amended to be reported favorably to the House, and the chairman announced that the ayes had it.

Mr. HOBLITZELL (in his seat). I call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not recognize the call for a division from any gentleman while in his seat.

Mr. HOBLITZELL (rising). I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 1.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. No quorum has voted.

Mr. MATSON. I hope the gentleman will not make that point.

Mr. HOLMES. I trust the gentleman will not insist upon that point.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I will withdraw the point with the understanding that this bill shall not be voted on in the House except there is a quorum present.

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

So (no further count being called for) the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN R. WALLACE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4439) granting a pension to John R. Wallace.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of John R. Wallace, late a member of the Union Guards, of Davis County, Iowa, at the rate of $24 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions was to strike out the words "at the rate of twenty-four dollars per month from and after the passage of this act" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, from and after the passage of this act."

The report (by Mr. HOLMES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 4439, beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner, John R. Wallace, asks to be placed on the pension-roll for disability resulting from wounds received in the line of military duty. That he is permanently disabled for manual labor, and that the disability results directly from the causes stated, he furnishes abundant proof.

His petition sets forth, and the accompanying evidence fully supports, the following chain of circumstances:

During the war there were repeated disturbances along, and raids across, the border between the States of Iowa and Missouri, attended with a continued and high state of excitement and apprehension. To repel incursions and preserve order on this border the State of Iowa organized a military force or forces. A part of these forces was a military company called the Union Home Guards, commanded by Capt. J. M. Garrett, who, like all other officers of these military forces, was under orders from the public authorities to be constantly on the alert and arrest all suspected persons.

The petitioner, John R. Wallace, was a member of Captain Garrett's company. On the 7th of November, 1864, he was ordered to accompany a party under the command of the second lieutenant of his company to arrest a couple of confederate officers who were known to be lurking in the vicinity. These confederates made a strong resistance, during which the petitioner's commanding officer was mortally wounded, and himself pierced by three separate bullets, to wit, pistol-ball, which entered his left groin, passing through the body and lodging against the spine; another, from a similar ball, entered above and about one inch to the right of the right groin, passing through the right side of the body and lodging in the back part of the body near the spine; also a third wound by a ball, which entered near the spine, and, passing to the right of the center of body, lodging near and under the shoulder-blade. Medical and other evidence shows that the claimant has been permanently injured, and that he is entirely disabled from performing manual labor. The details of the case show great suffering on the part of the claimant, and your committee think him as much entitled to a pension as though he had been technically mustered into the United States service and performed the same duty. We therefore recommend the granting of the pension, but that the bill be amended so as to provide that such pension be granted subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension law, and to take effect from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. HOLMES. I would say in regard to this bill that this claimant belonged to a company of home guards, called out by the governor of Iowa for the purpose of repelling raids along the border of Missouri. The attempt made to arrest two confederate officers resulted, as stated in this report, in the killing of the officer commanding the party and the wounding three times of this claimant. He is wholly incapacitated for any kind of labor; the least exertion causes great hemorrhage from his wounds. Indeed, he is as utterly disabled as a man can be from bullet-wounds.

There is no question about the disability and no question that the man was in the military service as a member of the home guards of the State of Iowa at the time the disability was contracted. He was never mustered into the United States service, but his case is similar to scores of others which have been passed through this House. He was in the service acting in behalf of a State in repelling the invasion of the enemy. He was engaged in substantially the same duty as those troops that were regularly mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I would like to put a question to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOLMES], who I believe made the report in this case.

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I would like to know whether there are precedents for the recommendation made by the committee in this case?

Mr. HOLMES. There are numerous precedents for bills of this character.

A MEMBER. Two were passed last Friday night.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman will allow me to add that if the application in this case had been made prior to 1874 this man would have been entitled to a pension under the general law.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The pension laws have included cases of this kind; but this man did not make his application in time.

Mr. STRUBLE. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. HOLMES] a question. If this soldier is entitled to be pensioned upon the state of facts presented in the report, why should he not be allowed a larger pension than $8 a month, which I believe is the rate proposed to be granted?

Mr. HOLMES. Because, being only a private, that is all he would be entitled to under the general law.

Mr. STRUBLE. But might not the pension be greater in view of the degree of disability presented?

Mr. HOLMES. We do not fix the rate at all, but allow it to be fixed under the general law. The examining surgeons will determine the degree of disability, and the man will receive pension accordingly.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ALLICIA DURRANT.

The next business upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5457) granting a pension to Allicia Durrant.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Allicia Durrant, widow of Henry K. Durrant, late an acting assistant surgeon in the United States Army.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the case of Allicia Durrant, by the Pension Office, having examined the same, beg leave to submit the following report, with an original bill:

Under the joint resolution of Congress approved May 29, 1830, the papers in the case of Allicia Durrant, widow of Henry K. Durrant, late acting assistant surgeon United States Army, were sent to the committee by the Pension Office for consideration as to the propriety of placing applicant's name upon the pension-roll by special act of Congress, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws, for the reason that her claim appears to the Pension Bureau to be deserving and meritorious, but can not be admitted under the existing law.

The record of service of Surgeon Durrant, when he was under contract, began May, 1862, serving as acting assistant surgeon United States Army, with contrabands at Beaufort, S. C., to April 5, 1865, except that in September, 1864, he was in charge of prisoners of war at Morris Island, South Carolina. In December, 1864, was on duty under General Hatcher, and was present at the action of Honey Hill, S. C. His contract was annulled, and he was mustered into the service as surgeon April 6, 1865. From April to August, 1865, was on duty with his regiment at Beaufort, S. C., also post surgeon at same place in March, 1866, and was relieved from post and small-pox hospitals at that time.

The proof proceeds to show that from March, 1866, to March, 1877, he was on duty at upward of forty different points between South Carolina and Oregon. He was much of the time in the Territories and among the Indians, and accompanied the expedition against the Modocs. Being taken sick at this time, he was directed, by Special Order 31, headquarters Modoc expedition, dated March 20, to proceed to the camp on Lost River and report to Assistant Surgeon H. McElderry for medical treatment. During all this time his duties were arduous, and he suffered much from exposure, deprivations, and fatigue. He resigned his position on account of poor health and went with his wife to the Bermuda Islands in hopes to recuperate, where he died of scarlet fever.

In a letter written by his wife she says:

"I can solemnly declare that my husband never had a day's health after the Modoc war. At that time he endured great fatigue and exposure, from which he never recovered. When his last fatal illness came his strength gave out, and you will see by medical certificates the physicians thought he might have recovered but for the existing heart trouble. The only person who knew of his condition was the surgeon that was in charge at the lava-beds during the Modoc war, and who died suddenly while there. The poor fellow only lived six weeks after he left, and when he contracted scarlet fever we never knew. He saw no patients, as he was not practicing, and we were together traveling all the time from Oregon to Bermuda Islands, where he hoped to rest and regain his health, but we were there only ten days when death claimed him."

The proof as to death, signed by Park B. Tucker, M. D., and John Wate Reed, M. D., inspector-general of hospitals, says that they were—

"Medical attendants of the late Dr. Henry Durrant, who died in this colony suddenly and unexpectedly of scarlet fever, in May, 1877, and we are of the opinion that he would in all probability have recovered from the attack had he not been laboring under some disease of the heart, which in our opinion was induced by overfatigue and anxiety during his arduous service in the United States Army."

This certificate is dated Bermuda, March 5, 1878.

The memorandum of rejection by the Pension Office says:

"Rejected upon the ground that fatal disease, scarlet fever, was contracted after the soldier left the United States military service; hence the general pension laws do not cover the case. It may be a proper case for the consideration of Congress."

Your committee, after duly considering the case, are of the opinion that the widow of this faithful and deserving officer should have relief. Her own health is poor, and she is in indigent circumstances. It is also quite apparent from the medical testimony that her husband's death, although not directly due to disease contracted in the Army, that he was nevertheless so reduced in strength and broken in constitution that he became an easy prey to the fell disease with which he was attacked, and it is a fair conclusion that had he been a strong man, in the full flow of health, when overtaken by the disease, that he would have fought it successfully and recovered. Having this impression, and believing that the doubt, if any, should be in favor of the claimant, the committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ANN M'CARNEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3331) for the relief of Ann McCarney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ann McCarney, widow of Thomas McCarney, late a private in Company B, Thirty-second Regiment New York Volunteers, and pay her a pension from the 7th day of July, 1863.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3331) for the relief of Ann McCarney, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner, Ann McCarney, widow of Thomas McCarney, late private in Company B, Thirty-second Regiment New York Volunteers, into which company he was mustered November 8, 1861, and from which he was discharged July 17, 1862, asks a pension on account of his death, which occurred July 7, 1863, which it is alleged was caused by disease contracted in the service.

The widow filed her application on June 19, 1880, but it was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the disease for which he was discharged and of which he died existed prior to enlistment.

As to the soldier's physical condition prior to enlistment, Michael Farrell, of Amsterdam, N. Y., testifies that when this soldier entered the service he was a well and sound man; that he was able to perform and did do hard manual labor; that when he returned from the Army in 1862 he was then sickly and feeble, and suffering from some disease; that he continued to grow worse and did not recover; and that he was in a failing condition ever afterward, until he died, July 7, 1863.

This statement is corroborated by Ellen McCarney and Susan Fitzpatrick, daughters of the claimant, and by James Fox and Francis Quinn, who were acquaintances of the soldier for many years prior to enlistment.

John Degolyer, who was a comrade of McCarney's, and a member of the company, remembers that soldier was taken sick while in the service, February, 1862; that while on picket duty he was out in a storm and got wet; that he returned to his tent, and next day had a very severe cold, and was so sick that he lay in his tent for several days, complaining of bad pains in his back; that he got around after many days, but did not get well.

Charles Devens, another comrade, and George W. Watkins, sergeant of the company, testify to same state of facts.

W. R. Little, the surgeon who signs the certificate of disability for discharge, says that he examined McCarney, and found him incapable of performing the duties of a soldier, because of "incontinence of urine" and general physical disability, and also says that this condition existed previous to enlistment.

The evidence strongly points to the conclusion that the soldier was a strong, healthy man before enlistment, and there is no positive evidence to show that he was not so. The physician who treated him during his sickness, and the only person who had professional knowledge of him prior to and subsequent to his enlistment, is dead. That important evidence is therefore wanting; but the testimony of his neighbors and the members of his family is positive that he was a sound man when he entered the Army. Your committee are of the opinion that he was so and that his death was referable to disease contracted from exposure and hardships while in the service, and that his widow is entitled to a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "volunteers" in the eighth line.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was read, and agreed to, as follows:

Strike out at the end of the bill all after the word "volunteers."

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is not my purpose to make any captious objection to any of these pension bills; but I desire to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAGLEY] who reported this bill, or, if he is not present, some other member of the committee, what evidence there was as to the disease of which this soldier died. It is not stated in the report, and because it is not I think the Committee of the Whole can not form any intelligent opinion whether or not the disease was contracted in the service. It seems from this report that the soldier did contract some disease in the service, and after having served eight months was discharged; but it does not anywhere appear in the report that he died from the disease which, as appears in one part of the report, was contracted in the service.

Mr. MATSON. I think I can satisfy the gentleman thoroughly on this subject. The second paragraph of the report states that the application in this case "was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the disease for which he was discharged and of which he died existed prior to enlistment." Now, it does not make any difference what the disease was. The Pension Office finds that that disease for which the soldier was discharged and from which he died existed during the time he was in the service and even before. It was upon this point that the claim was rejected at the Pension Office. But the committee find upon examination of the evidence that the finding of the Pension Office as to the existence of the disease prior to enlistment was not sustained. I repeat, it makes no difference what the disease was, the fact is admitted that the disease existed during the service and that the man died from it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Since the gentleman has called that paragraph especially to my attention, I see that the disease of which this soldier died was that for which he was discharged, and that the Pension Office rejected the application upon the ground that the disease existed prior to enlistment. But I submit there is nothing in this report to show that the disease which existed during the time he was in the service contributed at all to his death. It seems that at the time he sought a discharge he was examined by the surgeon, who found him incapable of performing the duties of a soldier, mentioning the particular disease with which he was suffering, and stating that this condition existed prior to his enlistment.

Now, sir, if that be true, then this soldier is not entitled to any pension, because he did not contract that disease during the time he was in the service.

I repeat, it nowhere appears in this report there is any evidence going to show that the disease he had during the service contributed in any respect to his death after he was discharged.

I know that it is useless for me to make these criticisms on this case, as it is likely the committee is going to pass this bill. But I think this is one of the cases which should be rejected on account of the insufficiency of the evidence.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRANK M. WOODRUFF.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2467) granting an increase of pension to Frank M. Woodruff.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to rerate the pension of Frank M. Woodruff, late a member of Company G, Ninth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery Volunteers, at $8 per month, commencing at the time of his discharge, deducting therefrom the amount that he has been paid.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2467) granting an increase of pension to Frank M. Woodruff, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner was mustered into the service of the United States on the 8th day of September, 1862, in Company G, Ninth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, to serve three years or during the war. On the muster-roll of the company for March and April he is reported absent, wounded, since March 25, 1865. He was mustered out on June 14, 1865.

The papers show that while in the service and line of duty at Petersburg, in the State of Virginia, on or about the 25th day of March, 1865, he received a gunshot wound in the right arm while in action, the ball entering inside the arm, near axilla, and passing out above the elbow, fracturing the humerus, near shoulder joint, and that for this wound he was treated in Emory United States General Hospital, Washington, D. C.

The petitioner was granted a pension of $3 per month from August 4, 1875, and also arrears at that rate from time of discharge. The amount was increased to $8 per month from August 2, 1876, and subsequently to $8 on October 15, 1880, showing that in the opinion of the examining surgeon the disability was progressive and increasing.

The petitioner declares that he earned nothing for over a year after receiving the wound; that he can not straighten his arm; that he is a poor man and has to labor for a living; that he is a carpenter, and as such had to either work for less wages or do special line of work; at times work at farming, but can do no hard work, such as chopping, mowing, cradling, &c.

D. B. Horton, examining surgeon, says:

"I find that a bullet entered on inner side of right arm, half inch below shoulder joint, and passed down the arm about six or seven inches, coming out on inner front of arm. The bullet shattered or splintered the humerus to some extent; muscles of this section are atrophied and partially paralyzed. Being the right arm, it must disable him very much working at any kind of labor, especially as a carpenter. The elbow having been bent to a right angle for a year has never become entirely useful; has not perfect use of hand, owing to paralysis of some of the muscles of the arm."

The petitioner is seriously disabled, and the Pension Office has exhausted its powers for an increase. Under the law he can receive but $8 a month. The bill asks for the payment of arrears at that rate from the time of discharge, but your committee are of the opinion that it will be better to grant an increase from the passage of the bill, being averse to the payment of arrears without a general law. It is, therefore, recommended that the following amendments be adopted: Strike out, in line 4, the words "rerate the pension," and insert the words "place on the pension-roll the name;" and strike out all after the word "volunteer," in line 6, and insert the words "and pay him a pension of $15 per month, in lieu of any and all other pensions now received by him."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, under the general law it is made the duty of the Pension Office to rate pensions. There are different degrees of disability, and it is the duty of that office in each case to determine the degree of disability under which the claimant suffers. It seems in exercising that power conferred by the law upon the Commissioner of Pensions this soldier's disability was rated at $3 a month. Subsequently he was re-examined, when it was discovered he was entitled to a higher rate. It may have been, and the report does not negative that opinion, that when he was put upon the pension-roll his disability did not entitle him to more than $3. I believe the Pension Office, with its surgeons to examine and rate these pensioners, can better determine the amount of disability than Congress, this House, or the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The committee, opposed as it is to the payment of arrearages, say in this case they will give this claimant $15 a month. That is, they do for this soldier what they have failed to do heretofore for others. They ought to be consistent with their past action, but in this case they raise the pension from $8, which is the highest he would be entitled to under the law, to $15 a month. That is not right.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] a few moments ago, in his compliment to me in reference to my action on the Mexican pension bill, said he would like to be able when he writes again to his friends in Iowa to say that I was also a friend of the Union soldiers. If the gentleman from Iowa has noticed my humble course since I have been a member of Congress he must know I have always been a friend not only of soldiers of the Mexican war and of soldiers of the Florida and other Indian wars, but of the Union soldiers of this country. And I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from a report which I made in the Forty-fifth Congress from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The Clerk read as follows:

The pensions of soldiers disabled in the line of duty are in no sense a gratuity, but are supported by contract made by the Government with them at the date of their enlistment, that if disabled they should have a pension. The consideration is the service and blood of the soldier. The parties were competent to contract. The subject-matter of the contract was neither in contravention of law nor of public policy, but was expressly authorized by law and promotive of the public good. It has every ingredient of a contract, as defined by all the law-books. The pension was predicated on the sole condition of the soldier's disability in the line of duty, and upon the happening of which condition the engagement of the Government became a perfect vested right, and was the property of the soldier as much as any bond which he may have held on the Government or other choses in action which he may have owned.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Now, to show that since that time I have not fallen from grace on that subject, I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the report I made on the Mexican pension bill that passed the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill as originally drawn in the second section excluded from its provisions any one who was already drawing a pension at the rate of $8 a month or more. This section was copied from the act of 1871 pensioning the soldiers of the war of 1812. The committee, after a careful consideration of this section and its effect upon those soldiers of the Mexican war who so gallantly fought in the late war for the preservation of the Federal Union, and who may have been wounded or disabled by disease while in the service, and for which they may be now drawing a pension, and after carefully considering the difference between an invalid pension and the pension proposed by this bill, unanimously agreed to strike out of this section that clause which would have excluded from the benefits of the bill soldiers of the Mexican war now drawing a pension for disabilities incurred in the late war.

The pension which such soldier may now be drawing is that which the Government owes him under the contract made with him when he was enlisted; that is, if he should be disabled in the service in the line of duty he should have a pension, and the soldier thus disabled is as much entitled to a pension under the law as he was to his monthly pay. The consideration of the contract is the service and blood of the soldier. There is no power in Congress or in any other department of the Government to take such a pension from such a soldier. He holds it by as firm and strong a title as he holds any other property.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, the remarks made by the gentleman from Alabama lead me to believe that there will be considerable discussion on this bill; and as the author of the bill is not present, I will ask that it be informally passed over.

Mr. PAYNE. The author of the bill is present now.

Mr. MATSON. I yield the floor to the gentleman from New York. I did not know that he was in the Hall.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have heard read the record of my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] and to find that he has been always and is now the friend of the American soldier. I was glad to hear him come down so gracefully to-night in favor of the poor old widowed mother in the case presented by the gentlemen from Iowa [Mr. HOLMES], and I hope before the pending case is decided that I may be able to write to this poor disabled soldier from the State of New York that the gentleman from Alabama is still a friend of the Union soldier.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. All I want is what is right. That is all I ask.

Mr. PAYNE. And that he favors paying pensions, and liberal pensions, to meritorious Union soldiers.

But, Mr. Chairman, this case illustrates what has been so well discussed in the House this afternoon, and that is the villainous system in relation to attorneys in pension cases as fixed by the present law. Congress in their desire to protect the Union soldiers has placed so small a sum upon the services of an attorney in the prosecution of pension cases that no real attorney, unless he has more patriotism than the most of us attorneys possess, is willing to spend his time in getting up the papers and preparing the proof, putting the case in shape, and presenting it before the Pension Office. And so it was in the case of this soldier. Poor himself, having nothing with which to employ an attorney except a contingent fee that might come out of the pension if it should be granted, he went to some person who could assist him in getting the proofs in shape. Having a good and a meritorious claim, as I believe from the examination of all the papers on file in the Pension Office in this case, if he had produced the proper proofs that he might have obtained, if that attorney had been competent to understand the force of evidence so as to have presented the case in the first instance to the Commissioner of Pensions as it really existed at the time that the pension of $3 per month was granted, the soldier would not be here before Congress to-day, for in that case he would have received the full amount of $8 per month, and received it from the time that the disability was incurred in the service.

But it made no difference in the consideration of his case by the office that his three years had been spent in the service. It made no difference that his right arm was practically of no use to him. He did not present his proofs in such shape before the Commissioner of Pensions as he might have presented them if a competent person had attended to the case, and hence his allowance by the office was but $3 per month.

Seeing the injustice of this insignificant allowance himself, knowing that under the pension laws he was entitled to more than that, he made application for an increase, but, as I understand the law, that increase could not date back to the time of the disability, though it was readily granted by the Pension Office at $5 per month. Still believing and knowing that he was entitled to more, he again presents his proofs to the Commissioner, and his pension is readily increased to $8 per month. But justice is not yet done him. If he had had the proper proofs in proper shape, if he had had an intelligent person to draw his papers and get his proofs in shape in the first instance, he would have received the $8 a month from the beginning.

Now he comes to Congress and asks that justice may be done to him. A bill is introduced to rerate the pension, and that he be allowed what he is entitled to, $8 a month, from the time that the disability occurred. But it seems that the Committee on Invalid Pensions had adopted a different rule in respect to cases asking originally for pensions in this House, a rule which excluded arrears. I do not know whether it ever applied to a case where there is simply an application for rerating a pension. But, as I have said, they adopted a different rule in cases asking for original pensions here, and this case seemed to come within the terms of that rule. And yet the committee, seeing the merit of the case and endeavoring to do justice, report a bill granting this applicant $15 a month from the time that the act takes effect.

Look at the equities of the case. If the man had gone one step further and lost that right hand, as I understand it, he would have been entitled to a pension of $18 a month under the general law. There is a difference in the degree of rating pensions as between a mere gunshot wound in the right arm and the loss of the right hand or of the left hand. It seems to me that the evidence in this case is convincing that it is almost a case equivalent to the loss of the right hand or of the loss of either hand. There is equity in it. He ought to have the $15 a month, because it is shown that the disability under which he labored is such that he can not carry on his trade—is not able to do his ordinary work.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Does not the report say that the pension is not based upon that ground, but to avoid the giving of back pay?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Chairman, if the committee have not given the right reason, this Congress can afford to give the reason or at least to do justice to the case whether the committee have put it on the right ground or not. But on either of these grounds and upon both of them it seems to me the House should grant the pension to this man at $15 a month from now out, and try to do that justice which has failed hitherto, because he has been obliged to employ an incompetent attorney, because the laws of this country as they have been ordained by Congress do not enable him to get a real attorney to make out his papers and present them before the Commissioner of Pensions.

I hope my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] will enable me to carry the good news to this soldier from New York that he is always in favor of giving to soldiers their just and honest due, and that he is not going to take advantage of any technicality or any failure in proof simply because a man has not been able to employ an attorney who could intelligently make out his proofs to present them to the Commissioner in the first instance.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not understand that this is a case of proof at all or a case of an attorney. I do not understand that it would have made the least difference in the world whether this man had an attorney or a claim agent at all—not in the least. It is a case of rating a disability. Attorneys are not supposed to know how to rate disabilities. Attorneys are not employed for that purpose, but to gather evidence and present the case.

How a man is rated under our practice is determined in this way: The claimant is ordered before a board of surgeons, three or five, appointed in the different districts throughout the country, the best surgeons being selected by the Pension Office to examine these applicants. This applicant doubtless—and I desire to have the attention of the gentleman from New York—went before such a board of surgeons for examination. What for? To ascertain and report the true physical condition of this claimant to the Pension Office and with that report to give their opinion of the nature, degree, and character of the disability. That report goes to the medical referee in the Pension Office who sits there from day to day, from week to week, from year to year, and passes upon all these cases upon the facts reported to him by competent medical authority, not the opinion of lawyers or witnesses, which is worth absolutely nothing in such a case as this. It is a medical question, pure and simple.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not the medical referee take into consideration the evidence of witnesses as to the disability of the applicant, whether it does not disable him from his ordinary avocations?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not as to the rating, not as to the question of the disability. He never looks at that. It is not laid before him. He receives only the report from the board of surgeons, and upon that he acts. He may approve or not.

He may find that one board reports one rating as their opinion on one state of facts which they report, and another board might report differently. Very often, therefore, these claimants are sent before different boards. And this claimant doubtless, if he made application, would be sent before a different board for examination as to his true physical condition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is very plain to my mind that this is a case which this House ought not to pass upon, a case which the committee ought not to pass upon. The Committee on Invalid Pensions is not a committee of surgeons—some of them may be; I do not know but there may be surgeons upon that committee—but the committee would not be supposed capable of passing upon a question of that kind. They did not have the applicant before them for examination, and are not competent, therefore, to report upon his true physical condition. And all this evidence that is presented is so much stuff probably. I know we have these reports; but, Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to those who make reports, I am inclined to treat them just as I do inscriptions upon tombstones—I never deny them.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It seems to me the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, if it proves anything——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it a question you want to ask?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then ask the question; and if the gentleman will answer my argument when he takes the floor I will listen to him.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman is to dictate how I am to ask the question, I will not ask it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the gentleman desires to ask a question, I will answer it if I can.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It strikes me that according to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio we should not change the rating under any circumstances.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It should never be done by this House or by the committee, and for this reason: They can not possibly have the necessary evidence before them to reverse the judgment of scientific men in the Pension Office, who are men of experience and who pass upon the question upon medical and surgical evidence. If we should do that, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] suggests to me, the House would be full of bills.

Therefore I say this is a case the House can not afford to pass. We can not afford to take upon ourselves the duty and the responsibility of reversing the judgment of scientific boards, and with no evidence before us but reports that are read here in our hearing.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions if he or any member on the committee can give the information upon what basis the rate of $15 a month was made? Was it a mere arbitrary fixing of $15, or was there any reason for it?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It was necessarily arbitrary.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. That is what I want to know. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can give me the information.

Mr. MATSON. I do not remember much about this case; possibly it may have been considered during my absence. I have very little recollection of it, and what knowledge I do have I get from the report; at least I have no recollection of any extraneous facts.

But from the report I gather these facts: This man was severely wounded in the arm, in the right arm. While the report of one of the surgeons, perhaps, as set forth in the report of the committee, states that the disability was a progressive and an increasing one, I think I am justified in saying that the committee arrived at the conclusion that probably that was not the case.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Would not the Commissioner of Pensions at once, on the presentation of this report, order this applicant before another board of surgeons, if he desired another examination in order to secure a just rate of pension?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And would not that evidence be better than such testimony as is presented to this House or was presented to the committee?

Mr. MATSON. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and to the House that my experience with those who have had their pensions increased is this: As soon as the pension is increased they form the idea that that ought to have been the rate from the date of the beginning of their pensions; that fact is true. I admit in all its force that whenever a man's pension is increased that idea strikes him at once—that the increased rate ought to have been the rate from the beginning of the pension.

In the case of permanent wounds that do not affect any other parts of the body than the wounded parts, the pensioner is probably right about that; probably his disability was as bad at the time he was wounded as it is now, just as great.

In investigating this case the committee probably—I want the House to understand that I have no recollection of it, but gathering what I can from this report I am satisfied that the committee concluded that this disability was one of that character, and each gentleman here to-night can form his own judgment about it. The committee probably concluded that the wound was of that character, that the disability was necessarily as great at the very moment of its infliction as it was at the time the pension surgeon last examined him and fixed the rate at $8 a month. We therefore concluded that injustice had been done this man and that we would increase the pension. That is the long and short of it, as far as I can get at it.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. And this is an attempt to get at the justice of the case.

Mr. MATSON. Certainly. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has adopted the rule, which I am sure will commend itself to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT], that we would in no case grant arrears of pensions, because to do so would be entering upon a very dangerous field.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Allow me to say that that was the rule adopted by the committee in the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses, when I was on the committee.

Mr. MATSON. I understand that; and that I suppose makes the rule the more commendable to the gentleman from Alabama. We are not asking to give this man any arrears of pension; but we thought we could do something to repair the wrong that had been done him. We thought that the wound, which was in the right arm near the elbow, created as much disability at the time it was inflicted as it does now; that he had for a great part of the time drawn a pension of $3 a month, and we would now increase it to $8 a month.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I do not think the gentleman has answered my question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. As my friend seems to be so very patient under questioning, will he let me ask him a question?

Mr. MATSON. Let me first answer the one by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL]. I will say to that gentleman that he is right in the supposition that the rate of pension here determined upon was an arbitrary rate on our part. We fixed the sum arbitrarily. We had no other data than the gentleman himself has from the report. We believed that rate would be about just and right, and therefore fixed it at that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The question I desired to ask the gentleman is this. Who does he think would be the best judge of the degree of disability, his committee or the board of surgeons and the medical reviewer of the Pension Office?

Mr. MATSON. Well, I might answer that question as they say our friends in the far East answer questions, by asking another. Who does the gentleman think was the best judge of the degree of disability, the man who rated it $3 a month, or the man who rated it at $8 a month?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The degree of disability might have changed. I am not a surgeon or a board of surgeons; but for my own part I am not willing to substitute the judgment of lawyers and Congressmen on questions of this kind for the judgment of a scientific board of surgeons.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The man might have been wounded and it might have been ten years afterward that the disability developed itself.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I think while the Committee on Invalid Pensions have sought to do justice and equity to this claimant, and in endeavoring to do that have rated his pension arbitrarily at $15 a month, according to the statement made by the chairman of that committee [Mr. MATSON] still it would I think be entering upon very dangerous ground for us to pass this bill upon any such statement of justice and equity measured by the Committee on Invalid Pensions as organized in any Congress.

One Committee on Invalid Pensions, very tender-hearted and humane might in the exercise of an arbitrary power fix a higher rate than another committee not so tender-hearted. Thus, after a while, we may find ourselves in the attitude of having various expressions of justice and equity emanating from various Committees on Invalid Pensions. It is like measuring equity according to the size of the chancellor's foot. Now, I do not think the heart of any particular Committee on Invalid Pensions is quite as reliable an authority to determine the rate of disability as the board of surgeons. They have no interest whatever in passing upon the different degrees of disability and determining the rates of various claimants. The law in the organization of such boards has had in view the securing of a body of disinterested judges to determine upon each case.

The fact that the pensioner in this case received in the first instance only $3 and that the pension was afterward increased to $5 or $8 does not imply necessarily that when he received $3 he was entitled to the $5 or $8. The rate fixed at the particular time simply expressed the degree of disability shown to the board at that time.

As I understand the statement of the gentleman from New York, there is partial paralysis of the arm of this pensioner; but it does not necessarily follow from the nature of the injury that this paralysis will extend to entire disability. On the other hand, it is possible that within forty-eight hours from the time we act on this case that arm may be totally paralyzed, and then the pensioner would be entitled upon an examination by the board to be rated at $18 a month, the rate for entire disability of the arm.

I submit that the action of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in fixing the rate of pension arbitrarily at $15 a month should not be accepted by the House when it may establish a bad precedent which may come back to plague us in the future. Surely such a precedent would do more harm than it can possibly do good. This soldier has the same means as every other disabled solder of being rated properly according to the measure of his disability by the action of the board of surgeons. By the finding of such a board he should stand as other soldiers must stand.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that the Commissioner of Pensions has no power to increase this pension beyond $8 a month, unless there should be total loss of the use of the right arm——

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Or disability equivalent thereto.

Mr. PAYNE. Or equivalent disability. I understand that the Commissioner of Pensions has exhausted his power in this case, because it does not appear that there is total loss of the use of the right arm.

Mr. MATSON. I must correct the gentleman. As I understand, the Commissioner of Pensions would have the right to grade this man at any sum from $8 a month up to $50 a month.

Mr. PAYNE. Then there seems to be a mistake in the report, for it says in so many words that the Commissioner of Pensions has exhausted his power in this respect.

Mr. MATSON. That is a mistake.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. He has exhausted his power, because the disability would not entitle the man to more than $8 a month.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The report states that under the law he can receive but $8 a month.

Mr. PAYNE. I have not been able to find in the statutes any stopping-place in such a case as this between $8 a month and $18 a month. As I understand the law, the rate can not be more than $8 a month unless there is total loss of the use of the arm—whether it be the right or the left arm I presume makes no difference.

Now, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL] says that the committee has fixed an arbitrary sum. Why, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how under the general law we get at the sum of $8 a month or $18 a month, or in the case of an officer $30 a month? Is not the sum entirely arbitrary? How do we arrive at the sum of $8 a month for pensions of soldiers of the Mexican war? Every general law and every special act passed for the purpose of granting pensions provides an arbitrary sum, depending, as is said, upon the generous heart of members of the committee or of the House. These sums are all arbitrary.

But the chairman of the committee says that they fixed upon this arbitrary sum in the effort to deal out equity and justice to this soldier upon all the facts in the case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I said before the trouble was with the man who drew the papers in this case in the first instance. I still think that was the difficulty.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then the bill ought to be recommitted.

Mr. PAYNE. By the papers in the Pension Office it appears that the final decision of the medical reviewer was based not alone upon the evidence of the examining board, but upon all the evidence in the case in regard to the disability. The evidence of the witnesses, the man's neighbors, those who worked with him, those who saw him day by day and had actual knowledge of the facts, is much better than the evidence of an examining board who only saw him but once.

Mr. ROSECRANS. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him I will present a similar case within my own knowledge.

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield to the gentleman from California with pleasure.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I know of a case where a man was rated at $4 a month. Under the excitement attending his presence before the examining board he seemed to have more power of his hands than he had before or had afterward. He was stirred up by the excitement of appearing before the examining board. Dr. Hamilton and Dr. Huntington thought it was a very curious case. After the examination the man was not able to unbutton his clothes or to feed himself. He had to be fed before he appeared before the examining board as well as afterward; but, as I have said, under the excitement of appearing before the examining board he seemed to have more power with his hands than was usually the case with him.

Mr. PAYNE. It appears this man was rated at $3 a month on the 4th of August, 1875. Less than a year afterward, on the 2d of August, he was rated at $5 a month. Each time he was examined by one of these boards of competent doctors. Again in 1880, four years afterward, he was rated at $8 a month. The committee find—and if the House would take time to read the evidence on file in the Pension Office they would be satisfied—there was no difference in his disability on the 4th of August, 1875, or in 1880.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. When did he first file his application?

Mr. PAYNE. That I do not know, and there is nothing in the report to indicate it. I do not remember that fact; and I would not undertake to say.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. He did not file till 1875, which is good evidence his wound did not develop into any disability.

Mr. PAYNE. How many thousands of pensioners there are who had as good a case in 1865 or 1866 as they had afterward, but who left their cases for fifteen or twenty years, meritorious cases, too, without bringing them to the attention of the Pension Office. It appears from the evidence in this case that this man was wounded, was in hospital, and that this disability which he received in the Army continued from that time down. By the evidence of the case, instead of getting better, it appears that the disability has been growing worse. The only trouble was in the preparation of his papers in the first instance in his not calling in the evidence of his neighbors, the men who worked with him and knew as well as any medical examiner could what the real trouble was with him and what was the nature of his disability.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, this has provoked such discussion I will ask, in behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, that this case and the one succeeding it on the Calendar, as the gentleman making the reports from that committee is not present in the House, may be informally passed over for the present.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think we should have a vote in a case of this kind, and that it should be voted down.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman will not lose anything by allowing the cases to remain upon the Calendar, as he will have an opportunity to vote upon them when they come again before the committee.

Mr. VALENTINE. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wishes to pass over this case, I must frankly say that I do not, for I believe that it is a case which ought to be voted on at this time and laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. In my judgment it is a good case and ought to be enacted into law. I have listened to the reading of the report and heard the remarks of gentlemen on both sides of the House. I believe that the committee acted wisely and that they are wise and proper persons to judge of the degree of disability. We all know, and especially those who have been giving personal attention to these pension cases, that under the general law which gives a certain sum to a certain class of cases or certain degree of disability in many cases coming under that class, by reason of its stringency pensioners are unjustly dealt with. There is no gentleman here on this floor who is not aware of that fact. Indeed, the Commissioner of Pensions has frequently admitted to me, as I have no doubt in similar cases he has to other members of the House, that if the law permitted him he would give a greater rate of pension. But the law did not give him any such authority. He was restricted in his action, and the only thing he could do was to recommend that the particular case should be taken to Congress. By the general law the Commissioner is restricted to a certain sum and to a certain degree of disability.

Now, in this case the committee reported they are satisfied the degree of disability which this soldier labors under is greater than that for which he has been rated by the Pension Office under the law, and for which he is now drawing a pension. They come into this House and state that we report to you our judgment to the effect that this soldier is entitled by reason of the degree of his disability to a greater sum than he has been paid; that he has not been receiving the amount he should properly have received, and is entitled as a matter of justice to the sum named. I for one am ready to grant it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VALENTINE. Certainly.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If the gentleman will examine the report he will find that it does not state what he is saying now. It does not say that he is laboring under any disability which entitles him to receive $15 a month.

Mr. VALENTINE. Not only has the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions so stated, but the report to this House shows conclusively that he is not receiving what he is entitled to, and that therefore the committee recommend $15 a month.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No; if the gentleman will examine the report he will see that it sets out the fact that in order to avoid giving back pay this sum is proposed. They do not think that he was rated high enough in the first instance; and to make up the difference they now propose that he shall go on at the increased rate of $15 a month.

Mr. VALENTINE. I know what the gentleman from Alabama says is contained in this report. But it also shows that this applicant has been unjustly dealt with heretofore.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me ask the gentleman from Nebraska if it is not better in his judgment to pass this over than to waste time?

Mr. VALENTINE. I admit that. I have no wish to consume the time of the committee. I do not desire to be classed among those statesmen who have been known so often to bud out in this House with a policy that would seem to indicate an opinion that it is better to consume a hundred dollars' worth of time rather than lose the opportunity of making ten cents' worth of objection. I do not want to be classed with them, and therefore I shall not detain the committee.

Mr. MATSON. I renew my request, and ask that this bill be laid aside informally.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is objection. If it be laid aside to come up before a full House on Friday next, I shall not object.

Mr. MATSON. To obviate further delay, I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that my object is to consult with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAGLEY] who reported the bill from the committee, with a view to having his consent that this and the next bill on the Calendar shall be recommitted to the committee for a further investigation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is satisfactory to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection this bill will be laid aside informally.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

JAMES M. ETTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4163) granting a pension to James M. Etter.

Mr. MATSON. I make the same request in reference to that bill, that it be passed over informally.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DORATHEA BOTHNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1084) granting a pension to Dorathea Bothner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Dorathea Bothner, widow of Gustavus Bothner, late second lieutenant of Company C, Thirty-eighth New York Volunteers.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1084) granting a pension to Dorathea Bothner, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

Gustavus Bothner, husband of the petitioner, was mustered into the service of the United States as second lieutenant in Company C, Thirty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers, December 12, 1862, and was discharged February 16, 1863. His death occurred May 12, 1874. At the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., he received a gunshot wound in the left shoulder, and it is so reported by the Surgeon-General of the United States Army. For this disability he was pensioned April 11, 1873, at $7.50 per month, to date from February 17, 1863. The widow filed her application for pension June 30, 1874, and it was rejected by the Pension Office, on the ground that the immediate cause of death—phthisis pulmonalis—was not the result of his wound.

Dr. B. A. Mylins, the soldier's physician, testifies as follows:

"That he attended soldier professionally for the last five years for neuralgia of the left shoulder and affection of the left lung, both caused entirely by a gunshot wound through the cord of the neck, the ball coming out at the left shoulder."

The same witness testifies again, May 6, 1874, on soldier's application for increase:

"That he is physician to the pensioner, and has been for eight years. He was suffering from gunshot wound of left shoulder. The shock to the muscles partly paralyzed the arm and side, causing a sluggish flow of blood through the lung; the cords of the lung fastening under the shoulder gradually became diseased, and finally worked into the lung, producing hemorrhage."

The same witness, who is an M. D., residing at 635 Lexington avenue, New York, testifies April 22, 1875:

"That he has been the family physician of the soldier from 1866 to the date of his death. At the time of deponent's first visit to soldier he found him suffering with pain in the left lung and lameness in the shoulder. Deponent made a number of careful examinations, and the result showed a wound from a gunshot, which entered the neck, grazed the cervical vertebræ, then passing down entered the cavity of the thorax, injuring the left lung, and finally came out between the ribs near the spinal column. The injury of the nerves caused partial loss of power, and the injury of the lung caused disease of that organ, evidently due to the gunshot wound. The disease of the lungs progressed slowly, but was incurable, and was finally the cause of death, which occurred from disease of the lungs, after eight years of regular professional treatment. Deponent can safely pronounce soldier's death to have been caused by injury to the lungs from gunshot wound, of which he died May 12, 1874."

The examining surgeon certifies to the good standing of Dr. Mylins as a physician.

Your committee are of the opinion, from the evidence adduced, that the soldier's death was plainly traceable to the wound received in the service. It shows that he suffered continuously from the time of discharge to death, and that the lung disease had its origin from the gunshot wound. Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of H. R. 1084, granting the relief asked for by the petitioner.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ELLIDA I. MIDDLETON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2702) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellida I. Middleton, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Edward Middleton, United States Navy.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name Ellida I. Middleton, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Edward Middleton, United States Navy, and to pay her, from and after the passage of this act, the sum of $50 per month.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 2702, after duly considering the same, report it back and recommend its passage on the following statement of facts:

Rear-Admiral Edward Middleton entered the Navy in July, 1828, and served twenty-two years at sea in all grades up to that of commodore, and that during the period of nearly fifty-five years in the service of his country he won the approval of the Navy Department. His last command was that of the Pensacola navy-yard. While there he was retired from active service at the head of the list of commodores, having reached the age of 62. In two months he would have been commissioned a rear-admiral and received the pay of that grade. Congress, recognizing his claim to promotion, in 1876 passed a special act advancing him to the grade of rear-admiral on the retired-list, but not mentioning any increased pay corresponding to the rank given, he was not benefited pecuniarily thereby. He died in the city of Washington, D. C., on the 27th day of April, 1883.

He inherited from his forefathers a valuable property situated near Charleston, which was destroyed by the Union armies in their occupancy of that portion of the State just before the close of the late war. His widow, Ellida I. Middleton, is left with two children, a girl of 14 and a boy of 11 years of age, respectively, in straitened circumstances.

Your committee can see no good reason why the said widow should not have the same pension that has been allowed to the widows of other officers of similar rank to that of her late husband, to wit, $50 a month. Rear-Admiral Middleton spent the best years of his life in the service of his country, during which time he could not successfully engage in private business, so as to provide for his family after his death. In a large number of similar cases the Government has recognized its responsibility for the support of the widow of a naval officer above the rank of captain by granting her a pension of $50 a month. Your committee therefore, following the precedents, recommend that the bill do pass:

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that he move the committee do now rise and let this case go over until Friday next. It is evident that it can not pass here to-night and ought not to pass.

This is a bill to grant a pension of $50 per month to the widow of a naval officer, and, while I know that there are precedents for such bills, no such bill ought to pass. When we grant but $8 a month to the widow of a soldier who was killed in battle and $30 per month to the widow of a major-general who was killed in battle, there is in my judgment no good reason—none has ever been offered yet that is satisfactory to my mind—for the granting of pensions of $50 to the widows of naval officers or officers in the regular Army.

I give notice now that there must be a quorum to pass such a bill as this. I do not wish to debate it if the gentleman will move that the committee do rise. If not, I desire to be heard further.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think if my friend from Ohio would examine back to see what has been done heretofore in just such cases as this, and probably cases not so meritorious, where the service was not so long at least, that he would withdraw his objection. I suppose there are sixty-odd cases, possibly more, where Congress has granted by special acts the increase of such pensions to $50 a month.

Now, I remember but a few weeks ago the gentleman from Ohio himself raised an objection to a pension in the case of the widow of Surgeon-General Barnes. And I remember when he was appealed to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] to withdraw his objections, he did so and let it go through. The gentleman is therefore on record as allowing one case of that kind to go through. Now, I do not pretend to say that this admiral's services were any better than those of Surgeon-General Barnes; but I do say his services for more than fifty years for his country—his whole life to his country—entitle his widow to this pension. He left a widow and two children in straitened circumstances, and it seems to me, as the Government has granted pensions in all such cases at $50 a month, the gentleman from Ohio ought to be willing to withdraw his objection and let this case go through.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do, very gladly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Has not this widow a pension under the law; and, if so, what is the amount of it?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. She has $30 a month, I suppose.

Mr. BLANCHARD. And this is a proposition to increase it to $50?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes, sir. There are about sixty cases where Congress has done it for widows of officers of the same rank. Congress has never refused in a single instance since I have been here to pass this kind of bills.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I did not catch in the reading of the report what was the full rank of this officer when on the active-list.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. He was a rear-admiral.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman from Alabama has referred to another case, in which my objection was withdrawn. I desire to state the circumstances under which it was withdrawn. I was called out of the House and was not able to come in at the time. The gentleman from Virginia appealed to me, and not being able to come in I said I would not continue my objection, being out of the House.

We are told there are fifty or sixty precedents for this. I presume there are, but they are just fifty or sixty too many. If you can give me any other reason than that it has been done before for increasing the pension of the widow of a general officer of the Army or of a rear-admiral of the Navy who has received Government pay all his life, then I might withdraw my objection.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama says that Rear-Admiral Middleton left his widow and children in need. That was his fault. He should not have left them in that condition. Drawing the salary which he drew for the twenty or thirty years he was in the Government service, he should have made a saving. And I say we ought to teach these officers of the Army and Navy that out of their pay they are expected to make a provision for their families and learn to save as other people have to do.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Will my gallant friend from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. ROSECRANS. It seems to me a pertinent question to ask the gentleman. Do you think it is easy, from what you hear, for these salaried officers of the Army and Navy to lay up anything?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think they can, and they ought. If they exercise the economy which people in general are expected to exercise, they ought to, and I will state why.

Mr. ROSECRANS. When you state it as your opinion that they ought to, would it not be fair that an appeal should be made to the experience of those people? They are interested in their own cases; they are interested in the welfare of their own families, and so far as I know, except a fortunate few, with all the care they can take, they seldom accumulate for old age or for the support of their families anything that amounts to a row of pins.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In answer to the gentleman, I will say the widow of this officer is entitled under the law to $30 a month. She is entitled to just as much as the widow of a major-general shot on the battlefield is entitled to. I ask if this widow should be considered entitled to more than the widows of major-generals who were shot in the field under the command of my distinguished friend from California [Mr. ROSECRANS]?

Mr. ROSECRANS. I do not think myself I could point out a special reason why a rear-admiral's widow should receive more than a major-general's widow. But I will say to my distinguished friend from Ohio that $50 a month for a family such as hers is represented to be and such as other families are to whom Congress has given $50 a month is not more than a pension of $8 is to those who are able to cook and wash for themselves. I believe it is right to do what Congress has done in these fifty or sixty cases. When they find a family of a general officer are needy and appeal for at least enough to keep them decent, it is fair for Congress to increase their pensions as we have done in those fifty or sixty cases from the regular allowance of $30 per month to $50 per month.

Major-General Mitchell's widow was given $50 a month. Major-General Mower's widow—my friend from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] can tell us in what distress she is. She writes him that she needs it. I submit to the gentleman from Ohio whether, after having indicated his views and done that ably, and after we have given him credit for his spirit of economy, whether it would not be fair for him to allow the majority to settle the case in their way?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We are often appealed to in that way, and the appeal is very strong that we should do no more than express our opinion.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have rules of the House. It is assumed that we are always acting with a quorum in the House. We know there is no quorum here now; that only those have come here who have come to aid in the passage of these bills, and that bills do not have here the consideration at these evening sessions that important bills are entitled to have.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will ask the gentleman whether he does not come here to help to pass bills?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I did.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then why do you oppose them?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have opposed only those which I thought ought not to pass, and I have favored the passage of those which I thought should pass.

I desire myself to debate this bill at much greater length if it is going to be pressed to a vote. I think we might as well draw the line here and now. If we decide that the widow of a general officer of the regular Army or of an officer of the Navy shall be granted a pension of $50 a month, and only $30 a month shall be granted to the widows of the higher officers of the volunteer service, and but $8 a month to the widow of a private soldier, then let that be decided; and when it is once made the law I will make no further opposition, because no further opposition will then do any good. But in order to establish that rate, to make that the law, I must insist that we must have a quorum in this House. I hope the gentleman will let this bill go over until next Friday in the day-time.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly I will.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I want to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of reducing the pensions of officers and their widows to the same rate as that now allowed to private soldiers and their widows?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In reply to that question, I will say that that subject has been under consideration by the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, and I think it has been the opinion of the majority of that committee that there ought to be no distinction. While I have not in any speech or in any report which I have made expressed my opinion upon that point, now that the question is asked me, I will say that my inclinations are entirely in that direction.

At any rate I am settled in the conviction that we ought not to grant pensions of $50 a month to the widows of officers of the regular Army and widows of rear-admirals of the Navy, officers who drew large pay in their lives, and deny the same rate of pensions to the widows of officers who were killed upon the field of battle, and also give but $8 a month to the widows of private soldiers. I have no doubt on that proposition; and having none, I must insist upon such a question having consideration in a full House, or at least in a House with a quorum.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is wrong in one respect. Whenever the widow of a major-general has applied to have her pension increased to $50 a month it has always been done.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And been done by special act.

Mr. MATSON. That precedent, which I have had occasion heretofore to say I thought was a bad one, and which I should oppose if it was now at its inception, began by increasing the pensions of the widows of general officers who fell upon the field of battle; that is where it had its beginning. It was not begun with the widows of naval officers, but with the widows of general officers who were killed upon the field of battle, and among the first was the widow of Major-General Wadsworth, of New York.

That precedent led to another precedent, which is now well established. I refer to the practice of Congress in granting to the widows of general officers of the Army and the widows of officers of equal rank in the Navy who had served a long time, and whose widows were left in indigent circumstances, the same increase of pension.

The bill now under consideration was introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], who is not here to-night. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is willing that this bill shall pass the Committee of the Whole and be reported to the House, with the understanding that it shall not be voted on until Friday next.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] misunderstands me. I want this bill to have consideration in the House next Friday, not a mere vote.

Mr. MATSON. I understood the gentleman differently.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is what I proposed.

Mr. MATSON. The bill can not be reached then. If that is the proposition of the gentleman, and he still says that he intends to demand a quorum upon the bill, while I have not charge of it and it did not come from the committee to which I belong, it seems to me it would be useless to further consume the time of the House at this evening session.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I want a vote on the bill in the committee to-night. I am sure my friend from Ohio will withdraw his objection when he finds that we are all in favor of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I want to discuss the bill further before it comes to a vote.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama (to Mr. WARNER). I have faith in you, General.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am glad that you have. An old divine once said that no one ever succeeded in trying to serve the Lord in such a way as not to offend the devil, and I think that is a good rule to follow.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Stick to the devil. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will stick to the true rule. If this bill is to be pressed to a vote, then I desire to discuss the question further; if not, then I will not further consume the time of the House.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. If it is only a question of allowing the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to discuss the subject further, then why not let the committee sit here and listen to the gentleman while he discusses it, seeing that he has had no time to do so?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. You can not get a vote on the bill to-night.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If the gentleman from Ohio will agree to allow the bill to be reported to the House, I will agree that a vote shall not be taken on it except when we have a quorum here; and I will further agree that the gentleman shall have a full hour to discuss it, if he wants to do so, before I call the previous question.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. How long does the gentleman say he will allow for discussion in the House?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will give you an hour.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. When will it be called up in the House?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. When it is regularly reached. I will not ask that it be voted on to-night.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In that event, why not let the bill go to the House to be considered there with a quorum? This is an important question to be settled. Let it go over to be considered on Friday. We might as well settle this question upon this bill; because if the House determines to allow $50 in such cases, then we may just as well pass a general law and end these special bills. We may as well decide the question on this case as on any future case. Let us make this the test; but before we decide it let there be a fair discussion.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I want to state one other thing to the gentleman, and then if he will not yield I will give up the matter and we will pass over the bill. I want to state to him that this commodore owned considerable property about Charleston, S. C., which was destroyed during the late war; and that is one reason of the poverty of his widow and children. If the gentleman will not withdraw his objection upon that statement I can say no more.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman from Alabama makes a strong appeal to our sympathy. It is a kind of appeal that is made here day after day. But if we should yield to such appeals and pass bills upon the emotion of the moment, where would we be? That is what we have done in too many cases. I do not believe myself in this emotional kind of legislation.

I wish to say to the gentleman further that it seems to me in his last statement he has, to use a common expression, "given away" his whole case by changing entirely the ground on which he bases it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Oh, no; I have not changed the ground at all.

Mr. ROWELL. Did not the gentleman from Ohio in arguing this case a little while ago urge that this man ought to have laid up money for his family; and did he not give that as a reason why a pension should not be granted?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not change my position in that regard. This officer drew pay all the time he was in the Navy, and he ought to have saved enough for the comfortable support of his family.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I have shown you why he has not left property to his family; his property was destroyed during the late war.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Well, I must insist that we may as well upon this case decide whether we are going to allow $50 a month to the widows of officers of the regular Army and the Navy. When that question has been decided by a full House upon proper discussion, I shall have no more to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 35, noes 5.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, having had under consideration pension bills, had directed him to report back to the House various bills with the recommendation that they be passed with or without amendments, respectively.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 1084) granting a pension to Dorathea Bothner; and

A bill (H. R. 5457) granting a pension to Allicia Durrant.

The amendments reported to the following bills were agreed to, and the bills as amended were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 2017) granting a pension to Walter Dickson;

A bill (H. R. 3331) for the relief of Ann McCarney; and

A bill (H. R. 4439) granting a pension to John R. Wallace.

AMANDA CUTTER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar have reported with an amendment the bill (H. R. 3188) granting a pension to Amanda Cutter.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMES. That bill was reported to the House on an agreement with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL] that a vote should be taken on it in the House. I wish to act in good faith, but as the gentleman is not present I do not know whether he insists upon having a vote on the bill in the House or not.

Mr. MATSON. It was agreed that the vote should not be taken on this bill until a quorum was present, and therefore I move by unanimous consent that the bill be allowed to remain as unfinished business coming from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and to be taken up when that class of business is next in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. MATSON (at 10 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 12, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ARMAMENT FOR FORTIFICATIONS.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. It is to correct an improper reference. Yesterday a message from the President, accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of War in reference to seacoast defenses and their armament, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I move that committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, where it properly belongs.

Mr. ROSECRANS. It does not belong to our committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the change of reference will be ordered accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. ELLIS. Can not I have a vote on my motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do so. He claims an improper reference has been made, and it is a matter for the House to decide. It has been the practice to submit the matter to the House. It was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs at the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, as it relates to permanent annual appropriations.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that committee be discharged, and it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KEIFER. Let the communication be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The condition of our seacoast defenses and their armament has been brought to the attention of Congress in my annual messages, and I now submit a special estimate of the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, transmitted by the Secretary of War, for a permanent annual appropriation of $1,500,000 to provide the necessary armament for our fortifications.

This estimate is founded upon the report of the gun-foundery board recently transmitted, to which I have heretofore invited the early attention of Congress.

In presenting this estimate I do not think it necessary to enumerate the considerations which make it of the highest importance that there should be no unnecessary delay in entering upon the work, which must be commensurate with the public interests to be guarded and which will take much time.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 11, 1884.

Mr. KEIFER. The Committee on Appropriations have that same subject under consideration, and I think it is proper that this should also be referred to them While it is a request for a permanent annual appropriation, still it is a subject that must come before that committee, and had as well go before it now as at any other time.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, that communication relates to an appropriation permanent in its character——

Mr. ELLIS. Suppose it does?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Well, suppose it does!

Mr. ELLIS Who appropriates for fortifications? There can be no dispute about this reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, strictly speaking, under the rules of the House this question is not debatable; but the Chair has listened to the suggestions of gentlemen upon the subject, there being no objection.

Mr. REAGAN. I object to debate on this question.

The SPEAKER. The question is, then, on the motion made by the gentleman from Louisiana to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of this communication and refer it to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HANCOCK. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports, but the Chair desires to submit an executive communication and personal requests of members, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

LEASE OF POST-OFFICES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, in relation to the necessity of an increase in the appropriation for the ensuing fiscal year by reason of the passage of the bill (S. 1508) authorizing the lease of premises for the use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes, and also transmitting copy of a letter from the Postmaster-General to the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

R. 6416) to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads within the State of Kansas; which was ordered to be printed with the report of the committee.

Mr. HANCOCK. Regular order.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. I belong to the Committee on Public Lands, which is privileged to make reports in reference to land-grant railroads. Until this morning I have not been able to prepare my minority report. I ask whether the question of privilege covers my right to present that report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that it can not be done as a matter of privilege; but the Chair has just asked the House and obtained consent for the gentleman to present it. He can therefore submit it at any time during the day that he desires.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. BRENTS to present his dissenting views as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands on the bill (H. R. 6534) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and for other purposes; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the Committee on the Public Lands.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope we will not do that. We ought to have a morning hour to make reports. I have a privileged report which I desire to submit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that would be in order after the demand for the regular order if it be a privileged report.

APPOINTMENTS, NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Commerce having had under consideration the following resolution, respectfully report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HANCOCK. I renew the motion to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken. The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 40.

Mr. McADOO. I demand tellers on the motion.

Tellers were not ordered, 14 members only voting therefor.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the motion to dispense with the morning hour was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the bill make or require an appropriation?

Mr. PETERS. It requires no appropriation.

Mr. REAGAN. It requires an increase of rank of officers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it requires an increase of appropriation hereafter to execute its provisions. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the report, will be printed.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to present the views of the minority on this bill, to be printed with the report of the majority.

Mr. KEIFER. Has not the Committee on Agriculture the power to make appropriations in this respect under the rules?

Mr. AIKEN. This simply enlarges the appropriation already embraced in one of the appropriation bills, and for that reason we have recommended its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. AIKEN. I think I have the right to move, under the instructions of the Committee on Agriculture, its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. It is in order for the gentleman to move its reference to one of the standing committees of the House. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist on his motion that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. AIKEN'S motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Appropriations was agreed to.

FORFEITURE OF A LAND GRANT IN OREGON.

Mr. PAYSON. I call up for consideration the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon and to enforce the same by judicial proceedings, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, and put the same upon its passage, on which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] is entitled to the floor.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. THOMPSON. I gave notice yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that I would to-day make a motion to rescind the standing order of the House in reference to the consideration of bills coming from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for the erection of public buildings, and if in order, I should like to take up the matter and have it disposed of. We have too little time left to-day, as I understand that at 2 o'clock, according to previous order of the House, we are to have memorial services on the death of the late Mr. HERNDON, of Alabama. I gave notice yesterday of my intention to move to rescind the order in reference to public buildings, and I ask that it be taken up at once.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. THOMPSON. If I am in order I now make the motion to rescind the order by which the House set apart the 9th of April, and afterward from day to day until disposed of, for the consideration of bills for the erection of public buildings coming from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. DIBBLE. I object.

The SPEAKER. That is equivalent to raising the question of order as to whether the gentleman under the notice given by him can make the motion to rescind the order to which he refers. It is a matter of some importance and some difficulty. If it be a standing order the House made on last Monday, then the Chair perhaps would have little difficulty in determining what are the rights of the gentleman under the notice given by him on yesterday, but the real question appears to be whether that is a standing order or not.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand the gentleman from South Carolina to raise the point of order. I believe that is subject to debate. He raises the point of order, or rather he raises the question of consideration against the motion I submitted. I think the order made last Monday is in one sense a standing order of the House. When the subject was up for consideration on last Wednesday the question was made at that time whether it was a special order or not, and I understood the Speaker to rule it was not a special order and was not subject to the exceptions to be taken to a special order.

I wish to call the attention of the Speaker especially to page 3044 of the RECORD of the proceedings of the House, of date April 10, when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] made the point of order that this was a special order, and nothing but a special order, made by the House, and was, therefore, subject to be intereepted in its operation by any other special order or general order theretofore made, and especially was liable to be intercepted by the demand for the unfinished business coming over from the Committee on Public Lands. The Speaker ruled as follows:

If the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands and heretofore under consideration had been itself a special order it would have been excepted from the operation of the resolution passed on Monday, but it was not a special order. It simply belonged to a class of bills having a certain preference by resolution of the House over other business of the House. The resolution—

And this is the part to which I desire to call the special attention of the Chair—

The resolution of Monday is very similar to the resolution passed by the House during the present session, and usually passed at each session of Congress, setting apart a particular day or evening for the consideration of pension bills. This is precisely like the resolution on that subject, except it makes certain specific exceptions, whereas the resolution in reference to the consideration of pension bills on Friday evening makes no exception; it sets apart a day, assigns it, dedicates it to the consideration of a particular kind of business.

Now, in that case the Speaker ruled that this was not a special order, but that it was in the nature of a standing order of the House, precisely the same in its character, force, and effect as the standing order of the House which sets apart Friday of each week for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and for no other business, except that the Friday evening order of business under which the House operates, as a standing order, makes no exception in favor of any other character of business, whereas this order did except general appropriation bills, revenue bills, and other prior orders of the House. Therefore, it being in its nature a standing order of the House, and a standing order continuing from day to day until disposed of, under the demands of these gentlemen representing that committee if they choose to enforce the execution of that order, it continues to operate as a continuing standing order of the House until it finally exhausts itself with the consideration of every bill reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and possibly every one to be yet reported by that committee, and not only that, but all of the bills upon the Speaker's table which are reported from the Senate.

Now, what is a standing order of the House? There is a clear distinction between two classes of orders, that is to say there are two grades of orders—special orders, made for the consideration of a special subject and which terminate with the consideration of that special matter, and a standing order which is more permanent in its character and which must endure until it is rescinded by the action of the House itself. The special order exhausts itself with the subject-matter to which it applies. The general or standing order continues in force until action is taken by the House for its repeal.

Now, we have many standing orders in the House. The House operates under fixed rules. The rules then are but the standing orders of the House. They are in the nature of standing orders. Their effect is equivalent to that of standing orders. For instance, we have a standing order that we will meet every day at 12 o'clock until it shall be repealed by order of the House. That is a standing order until the House chooses to rescind it. Upon notice given in accordance with another standing order the House has the right to rescind it; and the other standing order to which I refer requires one day's notice of the intention to change the time of meeting. And so, also, with any other order which makes out and lays down the general order of business for the House, which it must adhere to and pursue from day to day until the business is concluded or the resolution rescinded.

This resolution under consideration to which I refer does that, and in that respect the Speaker was right when he said it was not a special order but a general or standing order, subject to be rescinded upon one day's notice. What is the difference between that and what you term a rule of the House? The language of the eighteenth rule of the House is:

> No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor.

Now, I apprehend that there was some reason for the adoption of that rule. The rules of the House should not be changed without due notice. Nor ought the standing orders of the House to be changed without notice. It ought not to be possible for any gentleman to rise in his place and offer a motion to rescind the rules of the House without due notice of the intention to do so. Nor is it admissible where a fixed rule has been made to change the rule without reference of the motion to the Committee on Rules and a report back from that committee. But, sir, the standing orders of the House, as I understand, are not of the same dignity as the rules of the House, while to a certain extent they have the same effect and force. They are not so general in their character and operation, but while they are not so general in their operation the House ought to have the same power to change them. A standing order of the House, such as this, ought therefore to be subject to a revision by the House. There ought to be and must be some mode left by which the House can disengage itself from the entanglement into which it may be placed if it chooses to do so. We ought not to be coerced in the contention of a rule which it becomes desirable and necessary to rescind. There ought to be some way whereby the House, when tired of the subject, might escape its consideration. Now, what chances are there to do that if this is to be considered as the rule of the House, to be rescinded only on a report made by the Committee on Rules?

But it is not nor has it become a standing rule of the House. Nor is it a special order of the House. Special orders are not rescinded upon notice. When the House has suspended the rules and made a special order for any purpose it ought not to be in the power of a simple majority of the House to undo that act. A special order has to be considered and the House does not intend to escape its consideration. It is limited in its operation. It does not continue except for that special purpose. The time to be expended in and upon it is not of sufficient moment to require the day's notice to be given that you will move to suspend it.

But here is a standing order assigning the consideration of certain business from day to day and continuing from day to day the consideration of a special matter, and I think it clearly comes within the range of the twenty-eighth rule that upon a day's notice it shall cease to be a standing order if the majority consent.

I therefore make the motion to rescind the general order made upon last Monday for the consideration of these bills on the 9th of April and from day to day until all of them are considered.

Mr. YOUNG. How much time have we on this side?

The SPEAKER. This is a question of order. The time for its discussion is within the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. YOUNG. I yield to my colleague the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

Mr. DIBBLE. As I understand, the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is to rescind a general order. I do not understand, even after his ingenious argument, that he claims it comes in terms under the rule which applies to a standing rule or order.

The very terms of the resolution passed by a two-thirds vote of this House in suspension of the rules declare that this is a special order of the House. The House declared that under a suspension of the rules, and that part of it is unchangeable, because the resolution has in it these words, "and that this special order continue from day to day," &c. Therefore the House itself, under a suspension of the rules, has determined that this order shall have the character of a special order.

But, Mr. Speaker, under general parliamentary law also it is a special order. It is not a standing order for this reason, that in its own terms it provides for its termination. It provides it is to continue until a certain contingency arises, and then it ceases; it "stands" no longer. A standing order is only abrogated by regular action of the House upon the order. It is therefore not a standing order in that sense. And it provides for limited debate, so that if the House proceeds in good faith under that order without interruption or filibustering, with the thirty minutes' debate allowed on each bill, the order would very speedily terminate. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think the point of order is well taken, because the order provides in terms for its own termination.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the point of order is well taken. It seems to me very unusual that the gentleman should make a motion to set aside a special order of the House made on a Monday when the rules may be suspended and which can only be made at that time. It would seem very strange after the House by a two-thirds vote had fixed a special order of businesss if it should be in order at any time to set that order aside. I think the question is too clear for argument.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair said when the gentleman submitted his motion, the only difficulty, or at least the principal one, about the matter arises upon the question whether the resolution passed on Monday is or is not a standing order of the House. The Chair has never decided, according to its present recollection, that the order made on Monday was not a special order. The Chair decided that the unfinished business which was sought to be introduced as against the business under this resolution was not a special order; and the Chair decided that this resolution was different from a mere order of the House fixing a particular bill for consideration on a particular day, inasmuch as it dedicated or set apart and assigned a day for the consideration of a class of business, and in that one respect the Chair said it was precisely like the resolution of the House assigning Friday evenings for the consideration of pension bills. But it does not follow from that that this is a standing order of the House. The Chair will cause to be read the definition of a standing order as laid down by Cushing in his work on the Practice of Legislative Assemblies.

The Clerk read as follows:

STANDING ORDERS.

> The orders of both houses, which are known by the name of standing orders, are those which they have from time to time agreed to for the government and regulation of their proceedings and which they have declared to be standing orders. Orders of this description do not expire with the session or parliament in which they are made, but endure from one parliament to another, and are of equal force in every succeeding parliament until vacated, rescinded, or abrogated by the house in which they are established. A standing order is sometimes made at once, but, not infrequently, an occasional order or resolution of a previous session or parliament is revived and declared to be a standing order. Thus a resolution of the house of commons of December 11, 1706, "that this house will receive no petition for any sum of money relating to public service but what is recommended from the crown" was revived June 11, 1713, and declared to be a standing order, and has ever since been observed as such. The system of standing orders, which plays so important a part in the proceedings of the English Parliament, has no existence in the legislative assemblies of this country. The nearest approach to it is found in the rules and orders of the Senate of the United States and other similarly constituted bodies. That branch being a permanent body, containing always more than a quorum of its members, and being duly organized, its rules and orders are not renewed from one Congress to another.

The SPEAKER. The order made last Monday may continue during the entire session, and would do so unless rescinded or repealed or unless the business for which it provides should be considered before that time. It might have continued to operate only one day, because it ceases to have any effect as soon as the business mentioned in the resolution is disposed of by the House.

It is in the power of a majority, as the Chair has decided heretofore, to control the business of the House, notwithstanding that order. A part of the bills to which the order relates are in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; the others are on the Speaker's table. The Chair has decided that as to one class of business embraced in the resolution the majority of the House can at any time prevent the further transaction of business under the order by refusing to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of such business. As to the other class of business, the majority can at any time refuse to proceed to the consideration of that class of business on the Speaker's table, and thus stop the operation of the order.

The Chair would be very glad, however, to have the sense of the House upon this point, and for that purpose will submit to the House the question whether or not the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] can now be entertained under the rules.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, is discussion ended on this question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair proposes to submit the question to the House. Of course gentlemen can make brief statements in regard to it.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, if I am recognized I would like to address the House briefly.

The SPEAKER. On this question?

Mr. YOUNG. Well, I must deal frankly with the Speaker and say that I do not desire to confine my remarks strictly to the proposition before the House. If, however, I am heard for a little while it may enable the House to give a more intelligent vote upon this question, though I propose to discuss a somewhat different question—the question rather of the propriety of the proposed action than the strict legal aspect in which the matter is presented to the House as a question of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] proceeding with his remarks?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. For what time?

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee desire?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the gentleman wish to discuss the public-buildings question for an hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. YOUNG. I want to reply to some of the speeches made within the last week. I am going to discuss the proposition that has given so much trouble to the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I will not object. I would rather hear speeches upon the subject than pass the bills.

Mr. BEACH. I think there should be some limitation of time.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee ask?

Mr. YOUNG. I would like to have thirty minutes. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JONES], who is entitled to the floor at 2 o'clock, will yield for thirty minutes, I will ask the House for an hour. I really believe it would contribute to a proper determination of this matter. I do not wish to speak for an hour myself, but would divide the time with other gentlemen. I think it might be well for gentlemen to sit and hear me for a while.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] insist——

Mr. BEACH. I shall object, unless the gentleman confines his remarks within twenty minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON. We want a vote on this question.

Mr. BEACH. At 2 o'clock the House enters upon another order.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I submit that the objection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] comes too late.

The SPEAKER. Not at all. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] objected and then withdrew his objection; but that can not prevent another gentleman from renewing the objection. If it could, a single member, by objecting and afterward withdrawing the objection could force a matter upon the consideration of the House.

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman from Ohio did not object to my proceeding with this discussion, but only raised an objection as to the length of time to be occupied.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; and when the gentleman from Ohio withdrew his objection, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] renewed the objection as to the time to be occupied, and desired to know how much time the gentleman from Tennessee wanted.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Is not that a matter within the discretion of the Chair?

Mr. YOUNG. I am willing to go ahead until some one desires me to quit.

Mr. REAGAN. As the gentleman does not propose to discuss the question now before the House, I object.

Mr. YOUNG. That objection comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. YOUNG. I had the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Tennessee, and when he made his request, which he could not do without first obtaining the floor, the Chair submitted it to the House.

Mr. YOUNG. I have been here for ten years and never objected to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] talking all he wished. I now want only thirty minutes to defend myself and my committee from unfounded and unjust aspersions. I think it is a little unkind on the part of my friend from Texas to object in this way.

Mr. REAGAN. My objection was made on the ground that the gentleman did not propose to discuss the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The question immediately before the House is a question of order raised by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON]. The question of order is whether this motion, notice of which was given yesterday, can now be entertained under the rules of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. Let us have a vote on the question.

Mr. YOUNG. If gentlemen want to vote on the question without knowing anything about it, let them do so.

Mr. THOMPSON. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] did not promise to give us any light on this question of order.

The SPEAKER. The question is whether the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky is now in order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If it is not too late, I would like to say a word on this point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will proceed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to appeal to the Chair not to submit that question to the House unless some one takes an appeal from his decision, because the ruling of the Chair on this question is so evidently right that even to admit the necessity of submitting it to the House would in my judgment be a thing that ought not to be done.

Now, Mr. Speaker, no motion can be made in the House except it be a motion provided for by the rules, and it must be made at the time the rules provide it should be made. The rules say what we can do and the order of business prescribes when we can do it. We have a provision under the rules that on Monday and on certain of the last days of a session of Congress motions can be made for special orders by a two-thirds vote, and at the time designated those special orders can force themselves right into the middle of business which has been presented and is proceeding under the ordinary rules of the House. By a two-thirds vote on Monday and those last days of a session of Congress a certain time is set apart and dedicated by the House to the consideration of that particular business which has been made the special order. At the time fixed it must be attended to, and unless a majority of the House at that time, on the question of consideration being raised, refuses to proceed with it, it must come up for consideration.

It was decided by one of your predecessors, Mr. Speaker, on that point that you can take a horse to the water, but you can not make him drink. And at any time the majority of the House, when it becomes dissatisfied with its own special orders, can refuse to go on and consider them. Special orders can hang in the House, and some have hung for two years. You can take it up and consider it for a little while and then let it be passed over, and in a month it can be taken up again, or it can be taken up next year. It is still a special order, and the moment a majority of the House wishes to take it up they can do so. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] can be submitted under the rules of the House provided no one objects. But objection has been made. It is a question in my mind, if he obtained unanimous consent, whether he could have moved to postpone to a day certain the consideration of the special order; but to move to rescind it is so clearly out of order that I hope the Chair will not submit it to the House unless some one appeals from his decision.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to make one or two suggestions in reply to what the gentleman has said, and then I am willing the House should pass on the subject. If I understand the gentleman from Iowa, he takes the position that it was not in order to make this motion which I have made to rescind the special order. I understand the Speaker has decided to leave that question to the House, whether it is in order now to make this motion after a day's notice to rescind this order.

I desire to call the attention of the House specially to Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, because it distinctly declares that standing orders are wholly unknown to the legislative bodies of this country. There is nothing like a standing order of the British Parliament. Their standing orders are their rules. They work under standing orders instead of by rules, as we do. Cushing says "the system of standing orders, which play so important a part in the proceedings of the English Parliament, has no existence in the legislative assemblies of this country." Why do they not? He says that the only thing which can be compared with standing orders of the British Parliament are the rules adopted by the Senate of the United States, because that alone is a continuing body in this country. This House of Representatives is not a continuing body, and consequently it can not adopt standing orders which will continue from Congress to Congress and bind our successors. The Senate, as I have said, is a continuing body. It changes one-third of its numbers every two years, but the rules which it adopts have a continuing effect. There any standing order continues until it is rescinded by the Senate, but we are not in a like situation; we are not a continuing body in the sense in which this authority on parliamentary law indicates.

I think, therefore, it is proper that the Speaker should submit the question to the House. It is with great propriety, in my judgment, he submits to the consideration of the House whether they shall reserve to themselves the right to set apart an order of that kind after a day's notice.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Was notice given by the gentleman of this motion to rescind the special order?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. When?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yesterday.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But the rules say you can only give notice to amend the rules of the House on Monday. It is not in order to do it on any other day.

Mr. THOMPSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon, the rule does not say that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is in accordance with the traditions of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am not old enough to know the traditions of the House, but I know that my motion is in order under the rules of the House. The rules say that on one day's notice a motion can be made not only to set aside a standing rule of the House——

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. You can not get the floor to do so, as it is not in regular order to give notice except on Monday.

Mr. THOMPSON. I got the floor on yesterday and gave notice that I would to-day make a motion to rescind that special order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, you got it, I suppose, on your good looks. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMPSON. I got it by the unanimous consent of the House, which is itself tired of the subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman speaks upon the subject, that is a different thing, altogether. I am speaking now of the rules of the House, not the subject upon which the House acted.

Mr. DIBBLE. May I ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question?

Mr. THOMPSON. With pleasure.

Mr. DIBBLE. Did not the gentleman qualify his notice by saying "if in order" he would give it? It so appears in the RECORD of yesterday, and no notice of this motion appears in the Journal.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not remember, sir, that there was any qualification. I think I said, in substance: "Mr. Speaker, if it is in order I will now give notice that on to-morrow I will make a motion to rescind this order of the House;" and the Speaker recognized my motion. By unanimous consent the notice was given. There was no objection made from any quarter, and it went into the RECORD.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It was in order if there was no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON. And I think further that it is eminently proper that the House should be able to pass upon the subject in some form. There has never been a ruling made by a Speaker, or a precedent established by the House upon the subject heretofore, and I think now is as good a time as can be found to make a ruling upon a question involving so much importance as this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready——

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. A single word, if the Chair will permit me. This will make a complete revolution in our rules, of course. It goes to the effect that when a special order is made by the House, by a two-thirds majority under a motion to suspend the rules on Monday, by anybody getting up in his seat any time thereafter and giving one day's notice that he will make a motion to rescind it, a majority vote of the House will be empowered to vacate that order. That is the effect of it. Now, the proposition on which the chair is called to rule—and I am satisfied that the present occupant of the Chair desires to be not only fair but more than fair with the House; but on this question we ought to divorce two things from each other, that is to say, whether we want to consider the question of public buildings as one thing, and whether to revolutionize the rules of the House as another.

If we do not want to go on with the public buildings, the question of consideration effects the purpose of my friend from Kentucky. But it will be a revolutionary proceeding if we now, without the consideration of the Committee on Rules, and merely with the animus behind this among gentlemen who desire to stop public buildings, shall in this manner change the rules of the House so that a special order made by a two-thirds vote and under a suspension of the rules on Monday can be vacated at any time by a majority. It revolutionizes the rule relative to giving one day's notice of the change as well as the other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no hesitation about deciding the question, and has already intimated to the House his opinion upon it. But this question very largely concerns the rights and privileges of the House itself as a body; and, as has been stated, it is entirely a new question. For that reason alone the Chair desires to have the advice of the House upon it. The Chair has an opinion upon it, which it has intimated.

The question is, Shall the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky be entertained?

The question was taken; and the Speaker decided that by the sound the "noes" seemed to prevail.

Mr. THOMPSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the Chair be kind enough to state the question?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is to rescind the order made on Monday last in relation to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The Chair submits the question to the House whether or not the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky shall be entertained. Upon that motion the gentleman from Kentucky demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 78, nays 101, not voting 143; as follows:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence for one day was granted to Mr. ADAMS, of New York.

THE LATE THOMAS H. HERNDON.

The SPEAKER. By resolution of the House, this day at 2 o'clock was assigned for the offering of resolutions expressive of regret at the death of the late THOMAS H. HERNDON, a Representative-elect of this House. That hour has now arrived.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret of the death of THOMAS H. HERNDON, late Representative-elect to this House from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That as a testimonial to his memory the officers and members of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted by the Clerk of this House to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the Senate, and that as a further mark of respect to the deceased this House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, as Colonel HERNDON's successor in this House, it becomes my duty, as his friend it is my privilege, to pay a humble tribute of respect to his memory. His well-known modesty and his aversion to everything like ostentation forbid that I should indulge in the language of extravagant praise so common on an occasion like this. I shall, therefore, in what I have to say simply call attention to a character of rare symmetry and completeness, and endeavor to hold up to public view the record of a life full of honors and full of usefulness.

THOMAS H. HERNDON was a native of Alabama. He was educated in the schools and at the university of that State. After reading law at Harvard University he was admitted to the bar, and thereafter devoted his life and his talents to the service of his people. He was several times a member of the Legislature. He was a delegate to two of the most important conventions ever held in the State. During the late war he was colonel of an Alabama regiment, and was several times severely wounded in battle. His command was engaged in the thickest of the fight at Chickamauga, where he received a wound which was at the time supposed to be mortal.

In 1872 he was earnestly supported by his party friends as candidate for the office of governor. His friends, who were numerous and devoted to him, justly considered him worthy to represent Alabama in the Senate of the United States, and frequently and zealously supported him for that exalted position. He was thrice returned to represent the Mobile district in this House. After a long and honorable career of public service, on the 28th of March, 1883, only a few days after his term of service in this Congress commenced, he died at his home in Mobile, in the bosom of his family and in the midst of constituents who were all his friends.

It was my good fortune, Mr. Speaker, to know Colonel HERNDON well. I knew him at the bar, and in public and private life. He was a representative man. He was a type of the best elements of his State. Always and everywhere he was a gentleman. Born in Alabama, he had grown with her growth. He had fought and suffered with his people in war, and in peace he had labored to restore the blessings of good government. He was thoroughly identified with the people of Alabama by birth, by association, and by common pursuits and common sufferings. He knew their wants, and was in warm sympathy with their purposes and their aspirations. Hence it is not surprising that the people of Alabama desired that his abilities should not be confined to the bar. Had he lived, it was the hope of his friends that his influence in public affairs should not be confined to the limits of a Congressional district, but might sweep out into broader fields of usefulness.

Colonel HERNDON was a model soldier, illustrating that rare combination of courage and gentleness which immortalized Sir Philip Sidney.

Mild in manner, fair in favor, sweet in temper, fierce in fight.

And in all the positions of trust to which he was elevated in civil life he exhibited the same modesty and courage that had rendered him conspicuous in the field. He was true at all times to his convictions and never swerved from the path of duty.

In private life Colonel HERNDON was modest as a woman, gentle as charity, and possessed a genial magnetism that attracted men and bound them to him "as with hooks of steel." While he lived laborious days, he did not scorn the delights of life. But it was in the sacred precincts of the home circle that his social nature shone with the purest luster. Upon his hearthstone the fires of domestic happiness always burned brightly. In his home peace and love were enthroned; there he found an incentive to his ambition and rest from his public labors. Learned and successful as a lawyer, brave and chivalrous as a soldier, enlightened as a statesman, singularly fortunate in all his family relations, his life was blessed with a larger share of happiness and brightened with more of "sweetness and light" than usually fall to the lot of mortals.

I will be followed by other gentlemen whose remarks will show in what high estimation Colonel HERNDON was held by his fellow-Congressmen. It was my desire, and it would have been highly gratifying to the family of our departed friend, that to-day's obsequies should have been graced by the taste and eloquence of my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COX], but I am this moment in receipt of a letter from him informing me of his being confined to his bed by sickness. In this letter he incloses to me a letter addressed to him by Mr. John Bigelow, formerly our distinguished minister to France, which contains sentiments so appropriate to this occasion, and so fitly illustrating the utilities of occasions like this, that I send it to be read at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

APRIL 10, 1884.

DEAR MR. COX: Until to-day I have had no opportunity of running through the memorial addresses which you were good enough to send me, and for which please accept my cordial thanks. I thank you not only for sending them to me but for uttering them. Any man who does or says anything to cultivate and cherish a respect among our people for their benefactors gives power to the Government, efficacy to the laws, and new guarantees to public order. In doing all this he in a corresponding degree checks and discourages the satanic spirit of detraction and irreverence with which the privileges of a free press are always conditioned.

Mortuary eloquence is neither history nor biography nor criticism, but the commendation in high places of those virtues which should illustrate public life, helps to elevate and sustain the national standard of official duty, and in that respect answers a purpose as important perhaps as if it embodied the fullness, the accuracy, and the discrimination of all three. The higher we raise the popular standard the more will the people find to admire and respect in those who have had a part in shaping the history of their country.

The taste and skill with which you have decorated the tombs of your departed friends one at least of your readers gratefully appreciates.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN BIGELOW.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune during the life of my deceased colleague, Hon. THOMAS H. HERNDON, to be numbered among his friends. We had known each other for more than a third of a century. During this long period our relations had been the most cordial, friendly, and intimate. What I have to say upon this sad and solemn occasion I know but voices the general sentiment of the people of his State from the mountains to the Gulf. No citizen of Alabama from its organization as a State was more beloved, esteemed, or respected. He was a native of Alabama, born and raised in the county of Greene, the most beautiful section of the South, lying in the heart of the cotton-belt, with its broad acres and fertile fields.

My colleague was brought up in the midst of a refined and highly cultivated community. He had all the advantages of learning that the country afforded. He received a classical education at his State university; after graduation entered the law school of Cambridge, Mass. He commenced his professional career in the city of Mobile. His education, training, and natural ability rapidly secured for him a high position at the Mobile bar, then as well as now noted for the number of learned, prominent, and distinguished lawyers.

THOMAS H. HERNDON was a true Southerner; a representative man of the South; the soul of honor; chivalrous, polished, and courtly in manners; kind and generous in spirit; conservative in temper and action; considerate of the feelings of others, but brave in principle and true to every trust confided in him. He had occupied many prominent positions in Alabama. The people of Mobile, when he was quite young—in 1857—knowing his great worth, appreciating his ability, integrity, and high character, elected him to the Legislature. During the great excitement which pervaded the South in 1860 he was elected a delegate from Greene County to the convention known as the secession convention of Alabama. He took a prominent position in that body. The result of that convention was the adoption of the ordinance of secession, on the 11th of January, 1861, which separated Alabama from the Federal Union. My colleague voted for that ordinance. He was one of those who honestly and conscientiously believed it was right. So believing, when the hour came for action, thoroughly in feeling and sympathy with his people, he joined the confederate army. By his valor, coolness, and efficiency in camp and field he was promoted to the rank of colonel. He had the entire confidence of the officers and men of his regiment; upon many fields of battle won the admiration of his general, who on several occasions mentioned him in his reports of engagements with the enemy for his bravery and gallantry upon the field.

During the war he was twice wounded so severely that he could with credit and honor to himself have retired from the army; yet so soon as his wounds were healed, like a true patriot, he would return to his command. There he remained to the close of the war, until his chief surrendered and the cause which he so nobly and gallantly espoused was lost. The war over, his fortune destroyed and gone, he resumed the practice of his profession, and soon took rank with the leading lawyers of his State. The people of Mobile again called him from private life—elected him as a delegate in 1875 to the constitutional convention of Alabama. No one delegate took a more active part in that convention than he did or had more to do in the formation of the present constitution of Alabama.

In 1876–'77 he was again elected to the Legislature of his State, and was regarded as one of the leading members of that body, occupying the most prominent positions and taking an active part in the discussion of all important measures. In 1878 he was chosen a member to the Forty-sixth Congress from the first district of Alabama. He had not sought the position. At the time of his nomination he was actively engaged in his profession and was fast regaining his lost fortune. The people called him and he accepted the trust tendered. His course in the Forty-sixth Congress met the approval of his constituents and he was re-elected to the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, serving with distinction and ability upon the Committees of Foreign Affairs and Commerce.

But, Mr. Speaker, he was not permitted to take his seat in this Congress. After a long and severe illness, with intense suffering, he departed this life on the 28th of March, 1883, in the midst of friends and surrounded by the loved ones at home. Mr. Speaker, HERNDON has gone from among us; gone to a better, brighter, and purer world. The family circle will miss the kind, tender, and indulgent father, the affectionate, loving, and devoted husband; society, the genial, affable, and pleasant companion, the generous, noble, and true friend; the client, the able, faithful, and reliable counselor; the bar of Alabama, one of its leading lawyers and brightest ornaments; the State, one who may be truly classed among the bravest of her brave sons, a patriot, a statesman whose garments were unstained, pure and spotless, one who had been faithful to every official obligation during his public life.

Mr. Speaker, I was present at his burial and witnessed the universal demonstration, the grand outpouring of the people of Mobile to do honor to their distinguished Representative, to pay the last tribute of respect to one whom they had esteemed and honored in life. From the church to the cemetery the streets were alive with thousands of people, all classes, both races, the aged and the young. The various military organizations, secret societies, orders, and associations of the city followed the cortege to the grave. This demonstration told unmistakably and truly how he was loved at his home. He had lived with them from early manhood; with them he had commenced his professional career; they had watched his course through life with pride and admiration. They knew him well. They loved him for his sterling worth, the purity of his character, the sincerity of his friendship, for that noble, true, generous, and liberal heart that beat within his breast. As we stood around his grave there was another pleasing incident. The floral offerings, numerous and beautiful designs of rare flowers, covered the casket. After it was lowered to its last resting-place and all was over, garlands of choicest flowers, wrought by fair hands, encircled his grave. This pure, chaste, and beautiful offering from the daughters of Mobile spoke more eloquently than words how he was loved by his people at home, a people who will hold him in memory as fragrant as the magnolia groves that line the bay shore where he now quietly, peacefully, and calmly sleeps.

Mr. HORR. It falls to my lot to do perhaps an unusual thing, and that is to talk for a few moments to the members of the House in reference to our deceased brother and friend without that preparation which is usually made for such occasions. I shall make this attempt simply because of my respect for Mr. HERNDON, and my lack of preparation arises entirely from the fact that my other duties have been such that it has been impossible for me to find time to do what I should like to have done. Therefore, whatever I may say upon this occasion, while it may lack the finish which is due to such an occasion, will perhaps have one advantage—it will be simply what comes into my mind from the memories that cluster around the name of our departed friend.

Mr. Speaker, we learn but little of the real character of men as we serve with them upon the floor of this House. What I mean is this: That here it is always a sort of intellectual arena—a sort of fight which simply brings out one-half or one side of a man, so that you may serve here with a member year in and year out and yet know little of the qualities which go to make up his real character. Some one has said, I do not know who, that no one ever knows a person well unless he lives in the family with him, sees him in his own home, meets him in the little every-day affairs of life; and I sometimes think that perhaps that is in every respect true.

But while we do learn but little of men as we meet them here from day to day on the floor of the House, is it not equally true that we do often come to know men well with whom we serve upon the active, laborious committees of this House? For two years I served with Mr. HERNDON upon the Committee on Commerce. It was a laborious committee. I had there the opportunity to meet him almost every day of the session; for in the Forty-seventh Congress we were at work constantly in that committee. In that way I think I learned more of his character than I could have learned by meeting him on the floor of this House in perhaps ten years' service. During those entire two years, Mr. Speaker, I do not recollect a single instance of anything but the most pleasant relations between Mr. HERNDON and every member of the committee. And what is perhaps still stranger, while he and I differed as widely as two men could differ on questions of politics, I do not now remember to have had the least difference with him on any question of business, and that committee, as you all know, was devoted entirely to business, to the development of the business interests of the country.

I very well remember the last time that I ever saw him. The committee had been postponing for days matters which pertained to his State and district on account of his illness in order that we might receive from him his wishes as to the different matters before the committee. He finally came in—feeble, but with the same quiet, unobtrusive manner that so attached to him every member of the committee. And I recollect, as he went over the list and pointed out the instances in which his people were affected by the legislation we were proposing, how careful and conscientious he was to demand only what his people ought to have. And I reveal no secrets of the committee when I say that in a list of twenty requests we adopted without a dissenting voice every one of his recommendations. He was a safe man to follow. He was a man whose head was always level, and whose judgment was accurate on questions of public business or public policy.

Some of you gentlemen around me here who were his neighbors will no doubt speak of Mr. HERNDON as you knew him socially. I knew nothing of his family relations; but from my intimate acquaintance with him during those two years of laborious committee service I feel the utmost confidence in saying that he was a kind father and an excellent husband. And when you have said that of a man you have said more than when you call him a statesman. A great many men have been statesmen who have not been the best of citizens. But there was never a man who was the best of citizens, a kind father and husband, who might not have been, if given the opportunity, an excellent statesman.

I look back upon my relations with Mr. HERNDON as among the pleasant recollections of my life. I revere his memory simply for those quiet, sterling qualities which in our every-day life we recognize as the elements that dignify and ennoble the character of men in the genuine relations of life. More than this I could hardly say of any one; less than this I could not say of my friend, Mr. HERNDON, and do him justice or do justice to my own feelings toward him.

Mr. DOWD. Mr. Speaker, it is related of an eminent English statesman that, being about to sit for his portrait, he was interrogated by the artist with reference to certain splotches on his face, whether they should appear in the picture or not, he answered with emphasis, "Paint me as I am, blemishes and all." And when the late Governor Graham, of my own State, had delivered a well-considered eulogy upon the life and character of Hon. George E. Badger, being asked why he had not been more fulsome and ornate in his descriptions and characterizations, his reply was:

> It was not my purpose to see what a flaming picture I could draw, nor to make a grandiloquent sketch of an ideal orator, lawyer, and statesman, suited to no one in particular; but I was trying to describe George E. Badger just as he was, to draw a picture that would look like him and nobody else.

So in this instance. The highest eulogy that could be pronounced upon THOMAS H. HERNDON would be to describe him just as he was.

Whether as the youthful orator in his graduating speech, declaiming in tones of thrilling and fiery eloquence upon that patriotic sentiment, "Our country, right or wrong;" whether as the slender and handsome bridegroom, 20 years of age, leading to the altar a lovely bride of only 16 summers; whether as the young husband and father, kissing adieu to his wife and children and hastening to the front at the sound of war; whether lifting his voice above the din of battle and dauntlessly leading his comrades into the very vortex of destruction and death, or lying upon a soldier's couch, pale and exhausted from fractured limbs and loss of blood; whether thoughtful and grave over the problem of reconstruction or bearing down carpetbagism with the terrific force of his invective and ridicule; whether as the young barrister or maturer lawyer; whether in victory or defeat; whether rolling in pain and torture at his hotel while a member of this House or cracking jokes to groups of members and pages in the corridors and behind the railing in this Hall, wherever he was, whatever he was doing, his highest praise, his best eulogy, would be to hold him up before the public and let him appear ipsum ipsissimum THOMAS H. HERNDON, just as he was.

It is not my purpose to make any extended sketch of the life and public services of the deceased, nor to dwell at length upon the topics suggested by this occasion. I shall only refer very briefly to some of the leading events in his life and mention a few of his many excellent traits of character.

His father was a Virginian, born in Spottsylvania in 1794. At the age of 16 he came to Washington to seek employment, and formed the friendship of Gales & Seaton of the old National Intelligencer, and retained that friendship unabated through life.

His mother was a daughter of Judge Henry Toulmin, of an old English family who fled from the persecutions of the reign of the Second James and sought repose as well as political and religious liberty in the new colonies, settling first in Kentucky and afterward upon the Tombigbee, in Alabama. Judge Toulmin, the maternal grandfather, was a man of marked ability. In Kentucky, in early life, he was secretary of state and compiler of the laws. In Mississippi, a few years later, he occupied a high judicial station, and won great distinction by his decisions of questions then attracting the attention of the whole country. And still later in life he held high positions in the State of Alabama, being engaged, as the last work of his long and useful life, by the Legislature of that State, to make a digest and compilation of its laws.

THOMAS H. HERNDON was born July 1, 1823. His father was a successful merchant and farmer, having settled after leaving Washington on the Black Warrior, in Erie, Green County. THOMAS was a bright and intellectual boy and had good advantages. One of his first teachers was Judge Sam Houston, still living in Mississippi. Having taken a preparatory course at La Grange, he entered the sophomore class in the University of Alabama at the age of 17. Graduating with distinction in 1847, he went in September of that year to Harvard College, Cambridge, Mass., where, in July, 1848, he took his degree of bachelor of laws. In December, 1848, he was married, being only a little more than 20 years of age and his bride 16.

Mrs. Herndon, his excellent and devoted wife, is a daughter of Dr. Abram Franklin Alexander, an eminent physician and a North Carolinian by birth, whose ancestors for several generations lived in the county of Mecklenburg, which I have the honor to represent in this House and to call my home. Doctor Alexander was the grandson of Abraham Alexander, the president of the series of meetings which formulated, and of the convention which in May, 1775, promulgated the Mecklenburg declaration of independence, more than a year in advance of the national declaration of July 4, 1776.

Mr. HERNDON early took an interest in politics. In 1851 he was the nominee of the Democratic party for the Legislature, and though the county had a large Whig majority he was defeated by only a few votes. In 1853 he moved to Mobile and became a member of the law firm of Chandler, Smith & Herndon, which had a large and successful practice. He was elected to the Legislature from Mobile in 1857, and was a member of the secession convention in 1860. On the breaking out of the war he entered the army with the rank of major and was soon promoted to that of colonel, and was twice severely wounded. After the close of the war he returned home and resumed the practice of the law, but soon became again engaged in politics. He was among the foremost in that desperate struggle which resulted in wresting the State of Alabama from the hordes of carpet-baggers and plunderers who had obtained control in the dismal period of reconstruction.

In 1872 he was the Democratic nominee for governor of the State, receiving the full party vote, but was defeated by a small majority. In 1876 he was again a member of the Legislature, and had a considerable following for United States Senator in the Democratic caucus when Senator MORGAN was nominated. He was elected a Representative to the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses, and died on the 28th day of March, 1883.

My acquaintance with Mr. HERNDON began with the Forty-seventh Congress, and, knowing him somewhat intimately, I should say his most prominent characteristic was his extreme amiability and mildness of temper. His cheerfulness seemed never to desert him.

A long, painful, and hopeless illness did not render him morose nor drive away the softness and sweetness of his disposition. And yet he was fond of life, and had the keenest relish of its pleasures. An earnest and faithful worker in whatever he had to do, he was yet fond of amusements and keenly enjoyed his hours of recreation. Patient of labor, enduring with fortitude the cares and toils of life, he did not scorn its delights nor refuse to pluck a rose on his pathway because, forsooth, he might encounter a thorn. He seemed to appreciate the philosophy of life and pleasure as typified in the familiar stanzas:

There's a ripple of rhyme
On the river of time,
As it floats thro' the years and the ages,
And a sunny gleam
Or a golden dream
On the saddest of life's sad pages.

There's a sad refrain
To the sweetest strain,
The longest day soon closes;
And so we'll take,
For their sweet sake,
The thorns 'mid life's sweet roses.

The daylight fades
In deepest shades,
And life has many phases;
The falling dew
And sunbeams, too,
Make buttercups and daisies.

In his friendships he was both ardent and steadfast. Warm-hearted and genial, close and confidential with his friends, he united dignity with complaisance in that rare proportion which at once commands the highest respect and the warmest affection. It was only the beautiful and the good in the world that seemed to have any affinity for him. It was impossible for him to have an enemy, as there was no place in his heart for envy or hatred or malice.

To his life has flow'd
From its mysterious urn a sacred stream,
In whose calm depth the beautiful and pure
Alone are mirror'd.

With all this gentleness and softness of heart he adhered to principle with the firmness and heroism of a stoic, and he was as open and frank with an adversary as he was close and confidential with a friend, "as gentle as a woman—as stalwart as a grenadier."

In his marriage he was most fortunate. His wife was indeed a helpmeet for him. Engaged when he was 19 and she 15, it could have been nothing but a love match; and no two hearts could have been more closely united or two dispositions more perfectly assimilated and blended than theirs. Much of his success in life was due to the strong sense and inspiring devotion of his faithful wife. In the field of his enterprises and labors she was ever his bright incentive, in adversity his stay and support, in the hour of triumph she was his pride and his joy, and in affliction and sorrow his solace and comforter.

As their young hearts were cemented in the enchanted season of early love, so their wedded life seems to have been an unbroken spell of love. Theirs was truly a love-life. In a recent letter written with reference to this occasion, Mrs. Herndon uses this emphatic language:

> I feel that I should be more resigned to God's will in this sad bereavement because of the long, happy, and blissful life I have enjoyed.

To them love must have been the morning and evening star and the bright bow to span all the dark clouds that overhang the journey of life. It blazed upon the marriage altar and shed its radiance upon the peaceful tomb. In their home it was the source of beauty, the parent of melody, and its voice was music. It was the builder of their every hope, "the magician that changes worthless things to joy and makes right royal kings and queens of common clay; the perfume of that wondrous flower, the heart—a sacred passion without which we are less than beasts and with which earth is heaven and we are gods."

Mr. Speaker, there is no appeal from that inexorable decree which dooms us all to death. Generations of men will appear and disappear as spring and autumn and day and night, and the multitudes which now people the earth will soon be gone, as the flight of sparrows or the mists of the morning. Death is the antagonism of life, and the thought of the tomb is the skeleton at every feast. We do not want to go down into the dark valley, although its gloomy passages may lead to perennial sunshine and happiness—

For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause.
* * * * *
The dread of something after death,
The undiscover'd country, from whose bourn
No traveler returns, puzzles the will;
And makes us rather bear those ills we have,
Than fly to others that we know not of.

The hope of immortality was eloquently uttered by the death-devoted Greek in the beautiful dream of "Ion," and finds a deep response in every thoughtful heart. When about to yield his life a sacrifice to fate, his Clemanthe asked if they should meet again, and his response was, "That dreadful question I have asked of the hills that look eternal, of the clear streams that flow forever, and of the stars among whose azure fields the raised spirits walk in glory."

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas Mr. Speaker, the history of the life and eminent career of Mr. HERNDON has been well told by those who have preceded me, and I come now only to express my sorrow for his loss and to offer a brief but sincere tribute to his virtues and his memory. I was reared in the State of Alabama, and from my earliest boyhood whatever concerned the well-being and honor of that State or the character, virtues, and lives of her prominent men has been of great interest to me.

Although I had never met Mr. HERNDON until the organization of the Forty-sixth Congress, his character and public services and his eminent career were all well known to me. I was prepared to appreciate his inestimable worth. Our personal acquaintance began with that Congress, and our personal relations soon became most intimate and friendly. He was my friend, and when his bright life closed in death I sincerely deplored his loss.

Mr. HERNDON was no ordinary man. In private and social life he was a charming companion. He was the pride and admiration of every circle of friends. His finely cultured mind, the warmth and frankness of his genial nature, and his pleasing manners gave him a cordial welcome to every social circle. Indeed, in every element that ennobles human nature none excelled him, and no one in all the range of my acquaintance seemed to possess in such a remarkable degree all of those qualities of head and heart that make human nature lovable. There was no station in life for which he was unfitted, and none filled by him he did not adorn by his learning, ennoble by his virtue, and endear by his pleasing manner.

He was a thorough and accomplished lawyer, and was greatly devoted to his profession. At the very outset of his professional career he took rank among the foremost members of the bar of Alabama, then and now renowned throughout the Southwest for its thorough learning and integrity. His mind was incisive, analytical, and thorough. Though he possessed genius of the highest order, he reached his conclusions after patient consideration, and when reached he had the courage of his convictions, and maintained them with all the fervor and power of his nature. He was indeed an ornament to the legal profession, and his eminent career as a lawyer is worthy of the highest emulation.

As a soldier serving the "lost cause" his noble characteristics shone resplendently. Whether in the pride and pomp of the opening of the great struggle between the sections, in the suffering and privations of actual war, or upon the battlefield, or in the gloom and disaster of defeat, he was the same true, hopeful, and devoted patriot, beloved by all. In all the ranks of that great army that went to battle inspired by what it deemed a patriotic duty there was none gentler, braver, truer than the lamented HERNDON.

His name in camp and field was the synonym of all that is heroic in courage, noble in patriotic devotion to duty, magnanimous in victory, or hopeful in defeat. He loved his home, his native State, with more than filial devotion, and served her cause in peace and war with all the energy of his tireless nature. When the noble deeds of the sons of Alabama in that great struggle shall be gathered up by the historian there will be no brighter, purer, or lovelier chapter than that which shall record the sacrifices, the unselfish love of home and country, the indomitable courage and fortitude of her gifted son whose virtues we commemorate and whose death we now deplore.

His devotion to Alabama cost him years of physical pain, and finally his life. A wound received upon the battlefield shattered his frail form. Surgery was powerless to repair the injury. Year by year he walked in the very shadow of death. At last, in the meridian of his useful life, his spirit yielded to the conqueror, and one more victim lay upon the altar of patriotic duty.

When the war closed Mr. HERNDON returned to his home in the lovely city of Mobile and resumed the practice of the law. The vicissitudes and results of the war had swept away his fortune. He carried the wound which daily wasted his vital energies, but neither adversity nor privation nor wounded health broke his manly spirit. Success crowned his toil.

He was not, however, permitted to enjoy but for a short time the quiet and comforts of private life and the undivided pursuit of his profession, so congenial to his tastes and nature. Alabama had entered upon the most critical period of her history. She was in the jaws of reconstruction. The wisdom of his counsel was demanded in the service of the State. With that self-denial which ever characterized his eventful life, he abandoned his private business and entered the Legislature of Alabama. This occasion forbids allusion to partisan or political subjects that would mar its solemnities. In the presence of a common loss and a universal grief the voice of party is hushed, and eulogy records the merits which all alike concede. His election to Congress was a fitting recognition of the great service he rendered his people and State in the days of their trial, and with what industry, fidelity, and intelligence he served his constituents his colleagues bear willing testimony to-day.

Mr. HERNDON was not a politician in the ordinary acceptation of that character, but he was a scholar, an accomplished lawyer, a brave and generous soldier, and cultured statesman. He scorned, as unworthy his noble nature, the ordinary arts of the politician and the misleading artifices of the demagogue. He was a profound and independent thinker and maintained under all circumstances the courage of his convictions. His frail and wasted physical condition in some degree unfitted him for an equal part in the ordinary tumultuary proceedings of the House of Representatives, but in all those departments of labor devolved upon a member of Congress in which laws are primarily shaped and policies determined, in the council chambers of committees, in party conferences, he was the peer of any member who sat with him upon this floor.

Mr. Speaker, the family circle composed of husband, wife, daughters and sons, broken by the death of our friend, was a true type of domestic happiness. Whatever of the gloom of adversity obtruded upon it, whatever of disquiet and solicitude invaded its sacred precincts, was speedily expelled by the presence of its head.

His countenance was sunshine itself, his voice the expression of confiding love, and his deportment, under all circumstances, the offspring of the nobility of human nature.

He was a devoted husband—gentle, kind, and confiding; a generous, indulgent, loving father. All these virtues, and more, impressed themselves upon the modest home of that bright and happy circle. The gloom which now enshrouds that once happy home tells in unmistakable language the irreparable loss of wife and children, and proclaims in silent eloquence the virtues of the lamented dead.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose at this time to speak at any length of the life and character of the late THOMAS H. HERNDON. That has been done by others who are more familiar with his character and better prepared to speak of his many virtues than I am.

My acquaintance with Mr. HERNDON began soon after he became a member of this body, and was brought about by a similarity of names, on account of which I often received his letters and opened them through mistake, and he quite as often received and opened mine. And in this way an acquaintance began between us which became quite intimate and cordial, so much so that it was with much regret and sorrow I heard the sad intelligence of his death.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have only intended on this occasion to express the respect which I entertained for Mr. HERNDON, and to say that in all my acquaintance and association with him he always impressed me as a man of the highest and noblest character.

I never had the honor of serving upon any of the committees of the House with Mr. HERNDON. Nor did our legislative duties bring us in contact with each other very often. But I had opportunities to observe and did observe his deportment here as a member of this House, and I always found him to be, as my friend from Alabama [Mr. JONES] has said, a perfect gentleman. He was quiet, dignified, honorable in his intercourse with his fellow-members, and able and faithful in the discharge of his public duties. I have been impressed with the belief that owing to failing health Mr. HERNDON never exhibited to the House fully the ability, the high and manly qualities which he really possessed. But certainly, Mr. Speaker, no one who observed the amiable character, the exemplary life of Mr. HERNDON could fail to respect and admire the man for his many noble qualities.

I will detain the House but a moment longer. I only desired, as I have said, to pay a brief tribute to the memory of Mr. HERNDON, and in conclusion will say that I shall always remember him as one whose character it was profitable to study. He was a man of ability and sterling worth; a gentleman who brought to the discharge of all his public duties the highest integrity and fidelity, and we but honor ourselves in cherishing his memory.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, THOMAS H. HERNDON was a typical Southerner, one of that class we proudly point to as the outgrowth of Southern civilization. There is not a virtue that embellishes true manhood that did not find in him a perfect exemplification.

He was modest as a woman, tender as a girl, brave as a lion, generous to a fault, and, amid all the vicissitudes of an eventful life, whether radiant among his friends in the calm sunshine of peace, or in the vanguard of his comrades breasting the dark storm-clouds of war, he was absolutely true to his convictions of right. His character shone like a star, and like a planet in the heavens it became brighter and brighter as the night grew darker.

Intellectually he was not so pre-eminent, and yet he was possessed of distinguished ability. He was highly efficient as a legislator and devoted to the interests of his constituents; but ill health impaired his usefulness when a member of this House. He was a successful lawyer, clear in his perception of legal propositions and forceful in their statement. Here as everywhere his character came to his aid. He enjoyed the confidence of all men, and this gave him weight as a jurist and effectiveness as an advocate. In sarcasm he had the power to excel, but he restrained himself. His wit sometimes flashed and cut like a falchion, but he carried it as a sword asleep in its scabbard. The casual acquaintance seldom knew he possessed it. He also had fine executive capacity. In the dark days that came upon the South in 1867–'68, when in the South began that terrible political struggle which culminated in the great campaign of 1874, when of those who believed with him the stoutest hearts had lost hope, HERNDON came to the front, an appointed leader, and to him more than any other was his party in the beautiful city of Mobile indebted for the grand triumph it ultimately won. For his devotion, his patriotism, his unselfishness the people loved him, and as they loved him so he loved them.

Mr. Speaker, it has been my melancholy pleasure to attend two great funerals. I was at Cleveland, Ohio, where so many of the American people were gathered around the bier of the murdered Garfield. Never did the pomp and pride and luxury of grief find more fitting illustration. As I looked on the vast sea of humanity that surged to and fro it seemed as if the North and the South, the East and the West had met on one common ground. As the eye ran over the floral decorations, it appeared that Mother Earth had given up all her flowers that the florist might weave them into forms of beauty in honor of a favorite son; and when the black plumes waved and the grand cavalcade moved, and Euclid avenue, the most beautiful street in America, was packed for miles and miles with the procession, civic and military, that pageant was a revelation—a testimonial to the genius of the dead statesman the like of which eye had never seen before.

Mr. Speaker, there was grief there; the Union was mourning over the victim of the assassin. But, sir, there was something more than grief. The place that had been vacated was too great, the occasion was too momentus, the elements comprising it were too diverse, to permit that vast assembly to be animated solely by a single impulse. Even under the shadow of the tomb, though the thrill of horror that followed the shot of the murderer yet vibrated in the hearts of the people, there were hope and fear and wonderment and other impulses contending with the grief that permeated that mighty concourse of people.

Two years later I attended the other funeral. It was a beautiful April morning in a quiet Southern city by the sea. No tragedy had brought about the death of him we had come to bury. Human hands had not assailed, but human aid had been exhausted in the effort to save. He had died quietly at home, amid kindred and friends, the victim of a slow, merciless, incurable disease. If it had been possible, expectation had discounted grief.

He was not a great orator, whose words had rung over the Union. He was not a dead President; none came out of curiosity to see the face of the great man for the first time; but every home in that city seemed as silent as the grave. Its more than thirty thousand people had gathered to bury a dear, familiar friend. One impulse animated all; everywhere the paraphernalia of woe; everywhere flowers, tokens of affection; in every face of high or low, rich or poor, the signs of sadness and sorrow. It was a touching sight to see the merchant, the lawyer, the laborer, the old and the young, the white and the colored man pass one by one around the coffin, each taking a last sad look at the face of him who was the friend of all.

And so with mingled grief we laid our dead colleague away to sleep among the flowers. Rest thee, HERNDON! Your life was as beautiful as the flowers of the field, and it teaches a lesson that will not like them fade away and die.

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, THOMAS HOOD HERNDON was born at the village of Erie, on the Warrior River, in Green County, Alabama, on the 1st day of July, 1828, and died at Mobile, Ala., on the 28th day of March, 1883. He spent his boyhood at the place of his nativity, surrounded by the best influences of a home abounding in all that can refine the heart, improve the intellect, exalt the character, and develop manhood. From there he went to the State University, at Tuscaloosa, where he graduated in the year 1847. He read law with Hon. Joseph W. Taylor, a distinguished lawyer and orator, and at Harvard, and was admitted to the bar in 1849. He settled at the town of Eutaw, in his native county. Before he reached the years of maturity he was an ardent Democrat. He took an active interest in politics and became associate editor of the Eutaw Democrat, of whose editorial columns he had entire charge during the exciting times of 1850.

In 1851 he was elected a member of the house of representatives of the State Legislature and served for one year. During the month of September of that year he wrote a series of letters, over the signature of "John Taylor of Carolina," to the Montgomery Advertiser and Gazette, which exhibited his varied learning and brilliant literary attainments. After the expiration of his term in the Legislature he returned to his home and devoted his time to his profession, without any abatement, however, of his deep interest in the politics of the country.

In the year 1853 he removed to Mobile, and in the year 1857 was elected by the Democratic party to represent Mobile County in the lower house of the State Legislature. He returned to Eutaw in 1859, and was chosen in 1860 a delegate with Hon. James D. Webb to represent Green County in the secession convention of the State of Alabama. He was conspicuous as a leader of the younger members of the convention, among whom were many of the most brilliant young men of the State.

As soon as possible after the adjournment of the convention he entered the confederate army as major of the Thirty-sixth Alabama Infantry. He was afterward chosen colonel of that regiment and served with that rank until the close of the war. He was distinguished for high courage and gallantry as a soldier. He was wounded at the battles of Chickamauga and Atlanta, and surrendered at Meridian, Miss. After the close of the war he settled again at Mobile, where he engaged actively in the practice of the law, in partnership with his brother-in-law, Col. Robert H. Smith, the firm doing the leading practice in the city.

Colonel HERNDON never shirked the duties of a good citizen; consequently the drafts made upon him by his fellow-citizens, which were constant and heavy, were always promptly met. He was chosen president of the central council of the Democratic party of Mobile County in 1868, during the Presidential campaign of that year, in which position he displayed rare executive capacity and eternal vigilance. He was nominated by the Democratic party for governor of Alabama in 1872, but was defeated by Hon. D. P. Lewis, the Republican nominee, after a heated campaign, in which he fully sustained his reputation as a brilliant debater and enlightened statesman.

In September, 1876, Colonel HERNDON was chosen by his fellow-citizens of Mobile County as one of the delegates to represent that county in the constitutional convention which framed the present constitution of the State of Alabama. He was chairman of the committee on the executive department, and the people of the State are probably more largely indebted to him than any other delegate for the compact and methodical manner in which that constitution now exists.

Colonel HERNDON was again elected a member of the house of representatives of the State Legislature from Mobile County in November, 1876, and served as chairman of the judiciary committee of that body. He received a very complimentary vote in the Legislature that year for United States Senator.

He was first chosen a member of this House in November, 1878. He received the nomination from the convention of his party while absent from the State, without solicitation. He hesitated to accept the nomination, notwithstanding the complimentary manner in which it had been tendered, as by its acceptance he sacrificed a large and very lucrative law practice. The record which he made during his service here is known to the country.

Mr. Speaker, with my feeble words I feel that I will not be able to do justice to the character of my dead friend. Sublime in his courage, exalted in his ambition, noble in his patriotism, pure in his instincts, honorable in his actions, true in his friendships, THOMAS H. HERNDON combined in his character more of the human virtues and graces than any man I ever knew. His courage manifested itself in the very beginning of his career, and was always a conspicuous element in his character. Born of pure motives and lofty aspirations, it sustained him in the pursuits of private life and in the discharge of public duties, and enabled him to do right always, even in opposition to popular sentiment. Guided by wisdom and prudence, quickened by a sensitive conscience, he confronted danger when encountered in the discharge of duty with a calm fearlessness that made him invincible.

His ambition was of that exalted kind which lifts a man above mere personal considerations. He accepted position more to enlarge his field and increase his powers of usefulness than to gratify selfish ends. He was not indifferent to popular applause, but he never sought it. His highest ambition was to do his duty well. His patriotism was instinctive. He loved his country with devotion. He believed in her republican institutions, and favored the largest degree of liberty consistent with the good of society and the well-being of the citizen. At the same time he recognized the claims of Government upon the citizen, and was ever prompt to respond to the call of public duty—to spend and be spent in the service of his country.

In his actions he was ever honorable. His appreciative sense of honor led him to make any sacrifice for its vindication, for he was utterly incapable of doing a dishonorable act. In his nature he was refined. His instincts were pure, his feelings cultivated. He was a rare combination of bravery, tenderness, and truth. In his friendships he was sincere and faithful. No man ever enjoyed his friendship who was not impressed with the nobility of his character and the fidelity of his nature. His intellectual attainments were of a high order. He did not have that rugged strength of intellect which attracts attention by its brusqueness rather than its force, but his mind possessed all the elements of intellectuality in their purest form and so well organized that he enjoyed powers far above most men. To these great natural gifts, improved and strengthened by industrious and careful culture, may be ascribed the large measure of success which he attained in the various walks of life. His exalted character, his intellectual powers, his extensive and varied learning, his brilliant literary attainments, united with his industrious, systematic, and painstaking habits, gave him capabilities for usefulness that bore abundant fruit all through his active life.

His life was devoted to public interests. He loved his native State, and his best years were given to her service. In peace and in war his wisdom and courage have made their impress upon every page of her history. To him as much as to any other man in the State are we indebted for the restoration of our government to the control of our intelligent and virtuous classes. To his wisdom and patriotism we owe many of the wisest provisions in our present State constitution.

Alabama will always hold in grateful remembrance the valuable services of her gifted son, whose courage so strikingly illustrated her manhood and whose wise counsels contributed so largely to her prosperity and the advancement of her civilization.

My personal relations with Colonel HERNDON can not be described in language. I loved him as I loved my own soul. Drawn to him by a mysterious power which I could not resist, the feelings, aspirations, and secrets of my heart were confided to him with perfect faith. His tender sympathy was my consolation in the hour of my sorrows; his thoughtful advice was my ready assistance in the hour of trouble. I miss his friendship; I miss his love. He is gone; he is dead. He has crossed over the river and is resting gently in the shade of the tree of eternal life. His toils and his sorrows are ended. He is now gathering the fruits of his great and good life. The joys of heaven are his.

Decorated with a crown of glory, the reward of the virtues which adorned his pure life here, he awaits us beyond the grave. May God help me so to live that when this life is ended I may be permitted to join him in that haven of rest, where friendship and love which united us here may be revived and intensified through all eternity.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, that day in a man's destiny which is like no other is his death day, "a transition out of visible time into invisible eternity," and if not to be lamented, because the inevitable for all, yet it awakens a feeling of awe and deepest interest in the hearts of all, who must experience profound sorrow when one of the best and most useful is called hence. After what has been so well said concerning the character and virtues of my late colleague I fear that anything I may add will but mar the beautiful imagery and pathetic eloquence which have been expressed in words as perspicuous, pure, and select as the characteristics of him whose career they so faithfully portray.

But, sir, I knew and loved him too well to remain silent when the last sad tributes here in this grand old Hall where he served his people and country long and faithfully are being paid to his memory. No eulogium, however high; no feeling we can express, however deep; no praise we can utter, however extravagant, can benefit him now or add to his spotless name; that is as unsullied and enduring as the placid waters of the beautiful bay on whose shores he lived and loved so well and where his honored ashes now repose.

As the great rock in mid-ocean serves as the eternal beacon to the mariner, so his solid character stands a model, challenging emulation by the young men of his native Alabama. His scholarly attainments and thorough elementary training made him an accurate logician and gave him reputation as a lawyer. He was a sensible talker rather than an eloquent speaker. He was less ornate than solid. He knew that in this practical age eloquence of speech is of secondary importance to scope and variety of knowledge; but the delicacy of his constitution limited his research and hindered his progress. Of medium height, slender stature, and sallow complexion, his manner, while civil, respectful, and dignified, was also classical, clerical, and proud, rather than cordial; hence with those who did not know him well he was not popular. But beneath his cold exterior there was nowhere a warmer, more generous, sympathetic, or braver heart.

He was of high social qualities. His hospitality and liberality were bounded only by the extent of his means. If he had a fault—and who has not?—it was prodigality for his family and friends. To know him was to love him, and with those who knew him he was immensely popular.

My acquaintance with him began in 1867, and during the four succeeding years we served together on the Democratic State executive committee. In comprehensiveness and breadth of thought he was equaled by few, and in executive ability surpassed by none. In 1872 he was my successful rival for the Democratic nomination for governor of Alabama. But this, instead of estranging us, as such rivalries too frequently do, made us faster friends. During the sixteen years of our acquaintance our friendship grew stronger, and was attested by tears at our final separation.

Novalis, a German writer, has said that a strong character is but a completely fashioned will. This found illustration in my late lamented colleague. His intellect was the servant of his will. That deep conviction, that firm resolve, like the electric lamp on the Dome of the Capitol, shed its gentle yet steady effulgence on all around him and won their admiration.

Brilliant intellects with deficient will-power are too often like the threads of silver ore which lie scattered here and there, dazzling and encouraging by their brilliancy and surface richness, but, alas! when the deluded miner's expectancy is at its zenith the vein vanishes and his hope sinks with it. But that of my departed friend—light placer on the surface—deep down was a Comstock lode. The strong will is the strong man.

His devoted wife and grief-stricken orphans remain to cherish his name, but the loving husband, the indulgent and tender father, the true friend, the brave soldier, the wise statesman, the sterling patriot, the perfect gentleman, THOMAS HOOD HERNDON, is gone from us forever, leaving to his children the richest of all inheritances, a spotless reputation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the relation the cradle bears to the grave is painfully suggestive of both their near and natural kindredship. The one is succeeded by the other as surely as wave follows wave in the ebb and flow of the tide. The shrieks ushering into the family home the one unerringly foretell their approaching counter response in the wails at the brink of the other. The one is the known receptacle of our helpless loved ones for the time, the other for all remaining time.

In the one undisturbed quietude and repose are the conditions sought and fostered; in the other attained in a spell unbroken by our most pitiful endeavors. In the one we deposit the opening flowers of our love, sweetly dimpling in angelic beauty; in the other, their faded and dissolving forms, distressingly precious to our bleeding hearts. The one invokes our wakeful vigils for the continued vitality and healthful forthcoming of its loved occupants; the other our most agonizing solicitude for their revitality and immortal uprising. Around the one our hearts carol the lays of sweet affection and love; over the other afford heaven and earth incontestable proof of their depth and devotion.

This untiring devotion to the sleeping dead quickens into existence attendant genii standing upon the prostrate demon of skepticism, dissipating the clouds of his foul doubts wherewith he had sought to obscure the light of the star of Bethlehem, and proclaiming it all around the world that the love enkindled over the cradle will not expire or flicker, but shall survive with increased and increasing luster at and beyond the grave.

That the divine agency of the grave, in its exercises upon our hearts, is to our affections and love rather that of the crucible to the treasures of the refiner. That, phœnix-like, rising from the desolation and dust of that sorrowful and instrumental test, and free of all base alloy, our affections and love are divinely enstamped with the seal of an immortality proclaiming its birthright in the Heaven-ordained resolve to go to our loved ones by acting out through God's revealed means a—

> Life that shall send
> A challenge to its end,
> And when it comes say, Welcome, friend.

That this Heaven-ordained resolve, grounded in its firm foundation upon the immovable Rock of Ages, nurtures and commissions forthward the invigorated and entwining tendrils of our indestructible affections and love. That these tendrils, emanating from a sacred soil of the heart, not of the earth earthy, and wherein it is the pleasure of the divine Husbandman to culture his immortal exotics, lap over into the unknown world in pursuit of the absent loved ones, inspired by the truth of faith's conviction, that—

> Who in life's battle firm doth stand,
> Shall bear hope's tender blossoms
> Into the silent land.

That, in their ascending and unvarying course homeward, they will entwine and thread the golden trackway of faith up to that happy land that is fairer than day.

That, in the sweet by and by, and while awaiting us over there, they will be trailed by a faith reuniting our hearts in indissoluble ties with the dear loved ones gone before.

Could the innumerable tendrils of love, which throughout the ages have entwined their ascent homeward, all be unveiled to the human eye, if for an instant only, methinks the domain of space would glisten and glitter with their heaven-tinted weft and woof, while the boundless dome of the mansions of the blest would appear in the enchanting distance, canopied with their felicitous beauty and unrivaled splendor.

> O land! O land!
> For all the broken-hearted
> The mildest herald by our fate allotted
> Beckons, and with inverted torch doth stand
> To lead us with a gentle hand
> Unto the land of the great departed,
> Into the silent land!

What fragrant clusters of love's undying tendrils would be seen in that silent land, embosoming and embowering in their special entwinings the sweet and lovable spirit of the late and honorable THOMAS H. HERNDON, of Alabama, could only be dependent upon how many there were who came to a true knowledge of him while dwelling here upon the earth; for, Mr. Speaker, I hazard nothing in saying to those who truly knew him, none came to that knowledge but to love him.

Would that within range of subserviency to my call slumbered supernatural powers, the very inherent magnetism whereof when awakened evolved original and elaborate skill in the striking and refined tracings, the pure and delicate touch, and the polished, correct finish of subjects eliciting their transcendent dealing.

Even then would I barely be equal to the emergency of presenting him as he truly existed, than which no tongue or pencil ever descried a more pleasing and attractive image. Even then would I be trammeled with if not overcome by misgivings of success in an effort to hold him forth to those unfavored with a knowledge of his physical, mental, and moral outfit, robed in the grandeur of his finished and vivid portraiture. Powers thus scarcely less than miraculous in their exhibitions should at least be commanded to unveil to their enraptured view his stately person, magnificent figure, manly face, and towering, polished brow, ornamented in the majesty of exquisite features, and wondrous in their enkindled and enkindling inspiration.

Prominent among these gems of nature's royalty were his eagle-beaming eyes, the luster whereof was irresistible in the fascinations of their unexcelled charms; his finely marked, well defined, extended mouth, whose thin, seamed, compressed lips utteringly bespoke volumes in character and will power; his well set, thoroughly architected Saxon nose, jaw, and chin, whose classic mold significantly indicated their inseparable attendance upon rare, luminous forces and well-grounded powers. I would alike be dependent upon that miraculous power for the ability to depict with a vitality corresponding to that of life his penetrating and captivating expression of countenance; his looks, which had something in them so superexcellent and that was so wanting in a name; expression and looks, generated and born of, nurtured and matured by the inspiring glow and light illuming and wreathing this blended association, this grand assemblage of facial features and parts, pronouncedly imposing in the display of his thoroughbred personage—a personage calmly reposing upon its conscious and unstinted strength, as it unfolded an entirety embodying the richest and rarest profusion of nature's unbounded liberality, promoting him to the high rank reserved for those enstamped with her marked favoritism, and sweetly inducing the conviction that none was ever more fashioned, favored, and finished after the divine creative image of his Maker.

In despair of attaining to the goal of an ambition invoked in the interest of a consummately achieved portraiture of him, I find myself remitted to the cheerless undertaking, and with faltering expectations of its fulfillment, of what I crave may at least suffice as an acceptably wrought reminder thereof—in pursuit of this last resort, I affirm, and what was so well known to those acquainted with him, that in the particulars mentioned, including withal his entire mental and physical confirmation, a total exemption therein from any deformity or blemish afforded the least significant feature in his prepossessing and brilliant array. In the meanwhile their clustered and inspiring beauties, their diffused and animating enchantment, sealed with nature's impress of rare forces and high-born powers, would have invested the most exacting and unyielding critic with a spirit of positive inhibition to all promptings, the least suggestive of any change whatever, in a make up and finish wherein all were so lovably harmonious, impressively engaging, and attractively majestic.

In his stately person, in his sinew and muscles, his nerve, energies, power, and bottom, Mr. HERNDON, like the eagle or thoroughbred courser, was unencumbered with any of the dross or incubus resulting from redundancy of physical matter. If in his person apparent delicacy was to be seen, it may well be remarked it was untrammeled with any latent physical or mental effeminacy. Manifestations unmistakable in their teachings abound in the texture and fiber of his heft and elements, foretelling his ample capacity for active labor, thought, and speed, interlinked with corresponding powers of elastic endurance, and that when brought into full play they would not fail to put upon their highest mettle any and all who essayed in the commendable if perilous task of continuing abreast with him.

In his grand figure he would have been a conceded and esteemed model for symmetry to have pursued and copied, while in his manners he was so courtly, in his action so unaffectedly dignified, and in his courtesies of standard and high breeding so sweet, he could have been successfully presented as their hailed preceptor, whose exemplary tutorage would have challenged the profound attention if not the unqualified approval of all. Moreover, in the particulars pertaining to pleasing neatness and commendable taste and tidiness he was, what all would have held him to be, a finished pattern, dispensing with suggestions of improvement.

From his bewitching countenance uniformly flashed and radiated a beaming and bright expression of intelligence, sparkling as the diamond. Indeed, he was in every particular and essential entering into and constituting his elements, finish, and polish, naught less in his brilliant display and superb excellencies than a veritable diamond of nature in the great multitude of the human race; one, according to our American taste, too superexcellent and invaluable in its ingredients and composition to be misapplied in associations or comparisons with crowns of royalty, and yet never more fitly in its impressive place than when immortally bedecking the divinely royal brow of its own maternity, Dame Nature.

Besides, this bright, intelligent expression acquired new and increasing luster and attractiveness from a wreathed and savored sweetness of temper, profusely gentle, kind, true, and manly; a temper and disposition highly relishable in its refreshing and revivifying influences to all mingling and associating with him. For his was inherently a genial and companionable nature, enticing and luring in its exhilarating savory and fragrancy, insomuch its happy effects would have been no more apparent and palatable had they been susceptible to and substantially realized by its fortunate recipients through the tests of their natural senses.

As a resulting out-turn, a natural and crowning finish to a combination so uniquely interesting, he embodied and prefaced an interwoven beauty of person and countenance, adjudging him rightly and decreeing him justly to be "a joy forever." This pronounced beauty, in which he was so strikingly arrayed, was attractively arresting, even to the listless observer favored only with a passing view, and who could not fail to render him the just homage of his involuntary admiration.

Superadded to all this wealth of his enrichment by these most enviable parts, traits, and characteristics was his pre-eminence as the soul of honor, truth, and unalloyed physical and moral courage. Indeed, he never looked, spoke, nor acted otherwise, and was thus marked and unerringly emblazoned to mankind, insomuch those little acted upon by these noble and ennobling attributes failed not to recognize and appreciate his birthright and divine title to them.

A most brilliant and eloquent son of America, deplorably prostrated upon the ground by the baneful effects of inebriate habits, was stumbled upon at night by one, then, now, and likely ever to be the most eminent of all her renowned jurists. In reply to his apologetic inquiry as to whom he had so regretfully thus offended, the recumbent brother, with eyes peering up into the presiding beauties of the evening firmament, and in a voice ringing out in the stilly night musical and touching, responded, "A fallen star, yet beautiful and brilliant in the dust." The star of Mr. HERNDON'S beauty and brilliancy, unsubjected to intrusions in the dust, moved grandly and triumphantly on in the safe and sublime orbit outlined by the King of all true nobility for nature's ordained barons of liberty, among whom he stood by divine right a born and towering chieftain.

His mental parts were pre-eminently appropriate, and exaltedly becoming in the endowment and adornment of our brother in his native dignity and truly majestic display, rather than as so feebly and inadequately herewith sketched. His innate and imperial mental forces were robustly muscular and active. Unconscious of burden therefrom, they were, in massive capability, equal to the most extended thought, and linking enforcing argumentation—for he was mentally stout, erectly balanced, and firmly planted by nature—upon the unwavering feet of an intuitive logician of magical skill and power.

His perceptive faculties, potently penetrating and pellucidly clear, were marshaled and presided over by no less a luminary than if continuously companionated with some morning star, one of a glittering host apparently bestudding his intellectual firmament. Likewise with his descriptive forces, equally acted upon from the same brilliant canopy, rendering them vividly photographic in their nature and verifying action, even so much the object or theme he sought to array seemed present with and visibly standing before you.

His exhaustless fund of startling and inimitable humor, his blistering and withering satire, and his soul-upheaving heart-melting pathos never failed to come to the front when occasion demanded, nor of robing his subject or theme in the attire and style suitable to and sufficiently substantial for a full journey down the columns and currents of enduring history. For the lightnings of genius flashed from his eyes no less perspicuously than the thunders of eloquence audibly pealed from his lips. His sense of the ridiculous was simply the keenest of the keen, while his tact in its exposure, through rib-testing exhibitions, could not have well been surpassed. When thus engaged his memorable part was upheld and sustained amid surroundings of ludicrous scenery, most adroitly arousing, in its arrangement by him, and performed in a manner never to be forgotten by the multitudes inexpressibly refreshed while thrown into unrestrainable hilarity thereat.

His fancy, or imagination, corruscating with the brilliancy infused from his mental firmament, and aboundingly intuitioned for all the grand purposes of illuming with the heat and glow of a promethian fire his mental furnace, of roseating his sublime thoughts and ideas in colors and beauties suitable to their natural dignity and correctly ascertained magnitude, did not, however, sway the scepter of power in his well-ordered and solid mind. It was subordinated to the enforced position of an ever-present and ready auxiliary to his sterner, more useful, and enduring forces—forces which exhumed and prepared the ore, forged and welded the grand links, constituting the steeled, marvelous, and resistless chain of ponderous argumentation and fiery logic; faculties capable, and with electric thought, of eliminating from his subject, and down to the bed-rock thereof, all whatsoever foreign thereto or incongruous therewith; intellectual instrumentalities fraught with the power in their chemicalizing action of dissolving down to its original units the constituent elements of that subject, of divining and displaying them, with whatever pertained or related thereto, in all its phases and bearings, and with an accuracy, fullness, and power at once heralding the presence and dealing of the master-magician spirit of the same; mentalities imbued with Vulcan strength in their intuitive grasp of the fruitful and exhaustive results flowing from his profound investigations and powerful analysis; and in their gigantic stretches of his sweeping and overwhelming combinations they upheld, marshaled, and thundered his deductions and conclusions with a perspicuity and an intensity of feeling and thought few if any would dare wantonly to provoke, and fewer still would volunteer to improve.

No renowned, invincible chieftain ever descried with more unerring certitude the line upon which to plant the legions of his bristling columns for the approaching fray and in more frightful array to the foe than, with a strategy born of Omnipotence, did he align the assemblage of his grand mental marshals pending momentous struggles, invoking their rally around his talismanic banner. With a skill that was consummate and a tact that was supreme they were wielded and hurled upon the lines of the opposing forces with telling effect. No redoubtable knight upon the arena of a tournament, with his plumed fame rendering illustrious the legends of literature, and acting under a cordon of the inspiring eyes sparkling from the circles of assembled beauty and grace, ever displayed a more gallant mien and chivalric courage than did he unveil when, baring his helmet to the foe, he poised his trenchant blade, braced upon the lion-hearted breast of his indomitable will-power, and crowned with the dauntless majesty of his own native grandeur.

Powers so august and knightly in their brilliant array and action, so pronounced and defiant in their development and outcome, could have been no otherwise than manifestly and essentially Herculean in their origin. Their pre-eminence, however, was augmented in no inconsiderable degree by being the stalwart factors of a mind thoroughly organized and ramified in its unbounded area, height, and depth—factors rarely combined in one, whose unification was properly a notice to mankind of increase in their separately formidable but when aggregated their then accumulative and aggressive force. They were crowned with the prowess of a signal and vigorous training by, and a royal investiture in, the classic armory of thorough, finished scholastic attainments. Thus armed and equipped with all the needful instrumentalities for whatever contests that might arise, however heated, or to the hilt, if you please, he stood ever ready for the combat, and with his incisive weapons flashing with the burnished polish resultant from a thorough research, a profound investigation, and a wise understanding of his subject.

Mr. Speaker, generations will come and go before Alabama again may be able and equally so fortunate as to honor this Hall with the presence of another such son, another rarely endowed, exquisitely adorned, and wisely matured THOMAS H. HERNDON; one whose dutiful bearing toward and in her behalf was without complaint or reproach and above suspicion; one whose recognized relations to her, whether as a private citizen or a public servant, whether she was engulfed in the horrors of war or blissful in the possession of peace, whether reveling in prosperity's outturn or cast into the pits of adversity, could have been rendered no more pure, true, and filial in its sacredly fulfilled obligations and devotion than if borne toward the affectionate and honored mother of his birth; one who ever stood calmly ready to launch, with a heroism rivaling that of the bravest of the brave, his earnest, honest, and tireless endeavors even to the extremity of the pledge of his life, fortune, and sacred honor in the defense of her rights and the preservation of her untarnished fame; who was ever sagacious, wise, fearless, and faithful in all his acts in that behalf; ever unswerved or moved therein by selfish considerations other than those conspiring to her growth and prosperity; ever uncramped or acted upon thereby through any personal ambition other than in so far as it promised to promote her honor and glory; embedding his dauntless stand unyieldingly by her fortunes and honor, he contended with all the power of his regal forces for and by every honorable method attainable enforced, enlarged, and elevated her material, civil, social, and political existence and liberty as a great American Commonwealth, her constitutional duties, rights, privileges, and immunities as a proud State of this grand family union of States.

His unwavering devotion to, and unfaltering endeavors for, the good and glory of his own Commonwealth were not without their correlative blessings alike to all the other States; for the wholesome well-being of no member of the body politic could well be promoted without a resulting good therefrom to the entire membership even when not so intended. But, sir, it would be a rank injustice to his revered memory for lodgment to be suffered a conviction that the fervid patriotism, generating, nourishing, and maturing this sublime devotion to this unbounded interest in, the general welfare and honor of his own State, was confined alone to her borders or those of her soil.

Not wishing to encumber your time with a recital of his many private and public acts, and whose very essence was fraught with overwhelming refutations of an implication his instincts would have scorned and rebelled interminably against, allow me, with all becoming modesty, to suggest that the patriotism, like charity, its parent stem, which distills its benign influences and blessings profusely throughout the thresholds of its own borders, is the alone one ever yet commissioned by nature and countersigned by Heaven for a journey abroad; for that philanthropic visitation on which it was his bold and fond delight actively to engage, whose confines were never less contracted than the bounds of his own glorious country—yea, from the outposts of whose bounds it was his equal satisfaction unrefrainingly to wing his fruitful thoughts and blissful conceptions in the interest of the entire human family of the world, speeding them to an uncalled halt at the line defined by Deity as the exterior boundary of all finite advances; a boundary presenting not only an impassable barrier to all finite efforts, but also clearly defining the line of separation between the realizing present and the mysterious, unknown future, and whose alone extended limits constituted the only pent-up Utica known to his aggressive spirit in its towering career of his grandly superendowed powers.

The sunbeam sparkled with no more brightness to his radiant eye than to his illumed mind flashed and glittered the grand truth and its essential philosophy so sublimely expressed by Britain's world-renowned bard, when into words his pen ingemmed the undying utterance that—

> Heaven from all creatures hides the book of fate,
> All but the page prescribed, the present state;
> From brutes what men, from men what angels know,
> Or who could suffer being here below?
> The lamb thy riot dooms to bleed to-day,
> Had he thy reason would he skip and play?
> Pleased to the last, he crops the flowery food,
> And licks the hand just raised to shed his blood.
> Oh! blindness to the future kindly given,
> That each may tread the road marked out by Heaven,
> Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,
> A hero perish, or a sparrow fall;
> Atoms or systems into ruin hurled,
> And now a bubble burst, and now a world.

If in my feeble efforts thus far made in the display of our brother you have failed to see him grappling in tireless heroism with all the difficulties and troubles encountering the usefulness and honor of his pathway in life; if you have not seen him standing upon and master of the highest eminence of human thought attainable by finite capacity; if you have not seen him in the throes of a genius, pressing restively upon the limits prescribed to finite endeavors for room wherein to afford vent to cramped powers, with a mettle, physical, mental, and moral, no counterfeit in mankind could face, any more than darkness can confront the silvery dawn of light; with a devotion to right calmly unshaken by the prospects of immediate death; with a disinterested care and concern for the well-being of his species, obscuring self entirely from view, then, and indeed, have I failed to remind you whatever of him. These were priceless muniments of his more than enriched heritage. They were his birthright, descending as heirlooms from an ancestry who preserved them unimpaired and untarnished, and by him they have been alike transmitted to his own blood.

He descended from a lineage immortalized, more than a quarter of a century ago, by William Lewis Herndon, of the United States Navy, who sealed his devotion to duty with his life while in command of the mail steamship Central America. That noble sire, of the lines of lineage from whence our brother hailed, had passed through a terrific hurricane at sea only to find his craft disabled and irremediably sinking. Eliciting aid from some small vessels, happily in sight, he effected the safety of about one-fourth of the six hundred passengers and crew aboard the doomed craft, and to one thus escaping from her deplorable fate he committed his watch and other keepsakes consigned to his wife, then a resident of this city and the mother of the late and lamented consort of our present and highly esteemed most excellent President.

The abandonment of his sinking craft, with nearly five hundred souls yet remaining aboard and unprovided for, was so wholly at variance with his keen sense of the honor due to his country's service, that he remained upon her deck, wedded in death to his post of duty. The last seen of him by those escaping a watery grave through the aid of his unselfish and supremely noble nature was his proud person, clad in the full uniform of his rank and service, erectly standing at the wheel-house of his fast disappearing steamer. In this position undaunted he stood until the waters had passed over and closed forever from their view this commander of heroic blood. In language somewhat after that of another, may I not say—

> While he asked not that fame should his merits rehearse,
> Though he asked not a shaft to be sculptured in verse,
> The world beheld, in his stand, as he gave up the ghost,
> Blood, heroic to the last, when he went down at his post.

Among the "full many gems of purest rays serene the dark unfathomed caves of ocean" will reveal to the light of the last day, none will measure higher in the peerage of deathless devotion to the post of duty, ever the post of honor, than that of William Lewis Herndon.

The blush of shame should mantle the fair cheek of our country at the thought that until this day no monumental tribute has been reared to the imperishable memory of one who held that country's honor infinitely higher than he did his life. Such was the heroic blood coursing the blue veins and animating the big heart and brainy power of our deceased brother, the deserved kinsman of the immortal commander of the ill-fated Central America.

Sir, may I not, without the indulgence of any undue pride, mingle congratulations with my condolences to Alabama in her good fortune to have afforded this House and the world a specimen of our race so rare, noble, and commendable, and whose relation to her, be it said to her honor, though it may add to the poignancy of her grief, "was to the manner born?" His treasured dust rests and mingles with the perennially swarded, the flowery-odorized soil from whence it hailed. And the precious spot wherein that priceless dust is entombed will be pyramided by the hearts of her people in more arousing, enduring grandeur, and with more pulsating, thrilling expression of thought and feeling than was ever inspired or prompted by any of those materialized, stupendous structures of the East.

Mr. Speaker, however inscrutable the decrees of an all-wise Providence may appear to our finite capacity, the unconditional and trust-reposing surrender of our will to that of His own is only the more necessitated thereby; becoming, as it should ever be esteemed, our imperative duty. But how sublimely does it ascend to the pinnacle prominence of the highest of all privileges as well as a pleasing duty when, facing up to and beholding the unalterable decree suspended from the scepter of His omnipotent power, we read therein from His proclaimed will to mankind that all things shall work together for good to those who love Him.

With what awakened gratitude and heart-bounding delight should we hail and embrace a duty so profound in its blessings, a privilege so exalting in its exercises, as thus to combine and harness all things together in the interest of earnest coworkers for our present and eternal good; by whose consolidated strength the mass of darkness and torturous doubt surrounding and obscuring us from His divine favors would be dispelled, as it would open up and wall with His everlasting promises a clearly defined way from the footstool of duty to the elysium fields of unlimited and unending blessings, happily conspicuous among which would be a coinheritance as an adopted joint heir of His beneficent and exhaustless estate.

But grander and more munificent than all else would be our unrestrained privilege of mingling and participating with those, unceasingly glorifying His divine will. To this inheritance of that estate and to this admission of that grandest of all privileges our esteemed friend and dearly beloved brother was ushered on the twenty-eighth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, and in the fifty-fifth year of his earthly existence.

He had fought the fight, had kept the faith, and clad in the whole armor of God, he stood poised upon the crumbling brink, traced by the dread elements of the dark river, its unbaffled pilot skillfully untying the last tinsel cable confining his game spirit to the shores of earth. With a heart undismayed by any stings therefrom, unterrified by its somber, turbid surges, and reclining blissfully upon the hope which he had as an anchor of his soul both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil, he calmly looked out upon the approaching scenes, shifted and shifting under the guiding hand of the pale messenger. Moving out upon its eventful and awfully critical currents, he uplifted the telescope of a faith in his Mediatorial Master, the twin-sister of his inspiring hope, and saw revealed there through the extending hand of deliverance from the arm of omnipotent power of his Merciful and Heavenly Father.

Withdrawing for the moment his attention from the glorious insight thus afforded within the borders of the silent land, and intently conscious that he was upon the eve of closing his eyes in instant death, he turned them for the last time here upon the heart-broken partner of his toils, sorrows, and joys, bidding farewell to this fitful dream of existence, he whispered in his dying voice to that justly dear, untiringly devoted, and tenderly loving helpmate, as he mingled there with his last good-by on earth: "All is well with me." God succor, comfort, and provide for her desolate, distressed, and sorely tried heart in this overwhelming bereavement, is the breathing prayer of his and her innumerable friends.

That he should have passed away from earth poor in this world's goods, yet rich in his unproclaimed deeds of charity, was a fate inevitable to him—a fate induced, yea, fixed, by a generous benevolence and whole-souled charity for his fellows too genuine ever to allow its perishable trash to accumulate in hands never closed in the presence of the needy and distressed or under appeals for their relief. His wealth of intellectuality and Samaritan spirit interdicted that badge of poverty proclaiming there were none to do him homage. Thousands of scores there were of those who realized a special delight therein. Acres who had ever thus been acted upon, embracing all shades, grades, and conditions of society, stood in sorrow-breathing silence, and with eyes bedewed in tears around his bier, wherewith, under the soil of his birth, his idol form was being consigned to rest in the narrow confines of its long home—multitudes, embracing not only his own State, but scattered hither and thither throughout this broad land, though absent in person, were present and participating in heart-aggrieved contemplations the solemn ceremonies of that mournful occasion.

The fiat for his transition found him in the fruitful maturings of the golden autumn of his earthly career, richly ladened with and abounding in useful, rare, and superexcellent fruits, fruits endowing a life of unmixed blessings to his fellows and of assured immortality to himself. Our deprivations, as recipients, of those so much esteemed and coveted blessings are full enough to prompt our natures to arise in rebellion thereat and to deplore a calamity so calamitous. But the comforting unction comes in soothing benedictions to our aching hearts, imbuing them with the consoling assurance that our temporary loss has been his eternal gain. And while the loss may weaken the ties of earth, the gain will more than correspondingly strengthen the attractions of heaven.

> Dear, beauteous Death, the jewel of the just!
> Shining nowhere but in the dark;
> What mysteries do lie beyond thy dust,
> Could man outlook that mark!

That Mr. HERNDON'S career should have unfolded a life glowing with the inborn inspirations of a lofty genius, rich in its incidents and exhibitions of all the elements of innate and high-born manhood, and fruitful in its manifold feats of paramount usefulness and signal honors can be no matter of surprise to the least thoughtful.

That he should have inherently scorned, loathed, and repulsed everything unbecoming, low, or mean; that he should have enticingly led his fellow-man by precept and example onward, upward, and steadfastly in all that was noble, grand, and true, none who knew him would not, could not gainsay.

That he should have been one to whom mankind, in unsolicited choice, cheerfully and cordially tied in the closest bonds of unselfish friendship, unreserved confidence, and, as was so apparent to them, without the semblance of any hazard whatever to their confided trusts, is too plain not to be seen by all.

That he should have been one deeply, lastingly beloved by his people, should have been their special pride, the apple of their eye, the gem of their hearts' citadel, and should have been exalted and honored by them with lavishing hands and with fond delight, should not, could not excite any wonder.

That he should have been a cherished and finished ornament to society, one ever welcomed to its gay and festive midst by the greetings alive with the warmth of fond hearts alone; that he should have been a lawyer of unquestioned eminence, a warrior of unchallenged heroism, and a statesman of enlarged resources, resources coextensive with his growing country's increasing and vast demands, none can doubt. That his good name should have been esteemed and decreed by his people and those who came truly to know him as a jewel-coined synonym of the beautiful and bright, the brave and true, who could, if he would, dare deplore?

That this endeared name is thus enshrined and sentried in the hearts of the sons and daughters of his own loved, flowery land of rest, a land whose interest and honor it was his pride and delight jealously and zealously to guard on this floor as one of her cheerfully accredited, unboundedly intrusted Representatives, their entire united voice from her mountains to his own orange-grove seaboard promptly would declare. That he should have been a citizen of prominence in living up to the full requirements of the law, undauntedly maintaining on all occasions the majesty and supremacy of its mandates; that he should have been an endeared and an endearing friend, a devoted, affectionate, and tender husband, a loving, kind, and honored father, needs no affirmance from any one whatever.

That, though absent, he never will be forgotten by those favored with his acquaintance or blessed with his friendship; that though, alas! alas! dead, his memory will never cease to be treasured by them, and with increased and increasing fondness therefor; that though the grave, so beautifully defined as the footprint of angels, for the time may hide from us all that was mortal of our dear friend and brother, and yet that we shall be permitted to see him again, are all divinely bottomed intendments and glorious expectations we most confidently entertain. Their realization and enjoyment may be called in question, doubted or denied; but, if so, it will hail from those and from those only who in their hearts have said, "There is no God."

> If a star were confined into a tomb,
> Her captive flame must needs burn there;
> But when the hand that locked her up gave room,
> She'd shine through all the sphere.

Within man's mortal tenement burns a captive flame, lit up by the same infinite hand that enkindled "all the constellations that gem, like a diadem, night's brow." The beams of intelligence, ever emitting from that immortal flame, go out in quest of nature's mysteries as they sport in their contemplations amid the beauties, relations, distances, and orbits of the glittering host marshaled on the nightly plains, and eagerly seek to know more of the source of their own promethian fire. These fugitive beams, eluding the fetters of an irksome confinement, and with a speed in their flight unknown to electricity, bound to the outer circle of the remotest of those orbits. Even though disallowed the divine pre-eminence, whereon Israel's great leader stood when he viewed the landscape o'er, nevertheless, if guided by the light of the Star of Bethlehem, as they survey the limitless domain of space spread out before them, they may see through a glass darkly into Jehovah's pre-emption area, wherein his children arrived, arriving and homeward bound will find mansions prepared for them upon his eternal camping-ground.

How oft recalled to our contemplations is it as a melancholy fact, that the flowers we so tenderly nurture and so much enjoy in their fragrant array of unsurpassed glory, that the objects unceasingly caressed by our love's fondest affections and joyfully afforded favored niches within the temple of our hearts as idols of our life's devotion, all had the seed of death implanted within them when those of life were quickened into existence. But, sir, in our musings thereon how important that we fathom with earnestly inquiring thought deep down into the philosophy therefor would we contentedly learn and consolingly realize why all earthly pleasures and treasures of the heart are so transitory and fleeting.

When thus fathomed and comprehended we can not fail to recognize in them witnesses of Almighty God, whose testimony is sure, making wise the simple; whose evidence, disregarding all peradventure, wisely institutes and promulgates, as an anchoring conviction of the heart, the momentous truth that our Maker never intended this earth as man's abiding place. We hear it proclaimed on every hand that nothing dies but in fulfillment of His omnisciently established decrees, while by His divine agency we alike see and know its place is at once resupplied with newness of life.

Throughout all nature these reproductive links have been coining in continuous order from creation's dawn, and will so transpire until the hand that suspended this earth in the orbit of its existence and concentrated upon its prepared bosom the creative power of His own omnipotent will shall withdraw it therefrom. In man alone has He breathed the inspiration to look with confident hope beyond the dissolution of his earthly house of this tabernacle, and to know that he has a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. In his decay, step by step, as he descends to the grave, Faith illumes with extended and extending ken and Hope invigorates with increased and increasing brightness the grand truth embraced by Charity with unyielding devotion that with those wisely prepared therefor to be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord.

For this cause, though the outward man is perishing, yet will the inward man be renewed day by day. When thus reverently understood and spiritually realized, death becomes the unfolding door of entrance upon renewed, increased, and increasing vitality, wherein mortality is swallowed up of life. Through the thresholds of this unclosed door, open and to remain open for the reception of the last pilgrim of the human race, will continue to pass those more than golden links in the countless strand of the family of humanity, among whom will shine with a luster not of earth, a luster inherited and reflected alone from the face of their Divine Master, those of our race ransomed, purified, and redeemed by His atoning grace. This onward march to the source of all good will never halt until it shall have encircled and environed to the full measure of His own divine purpose the supreme throne of our Heavenly Father.

In accordance with His own eternal decrees, the last pilgrim of earth will have then passed through and closed forever behind him the door of death, and will have been added to that grand army, enlisted, marshaled, and encamped upon the Elysian fields of His unending glory.

We stand in the midst of the progress of this startling, momentous, and solemnly eventful existence, mingling therewith while borne upon its resistless currents to those near and nearing transcendent changes.

Clad in the livery of our dearest esteem, affection, and love for our so much missed, lamented brother, and planted within the inspired circle, reflected from and lined by the crowning halo of the immortal genii of our devotion, we proclaim it here and now, and with a resolve which shall know no varying or the shadow of change, that, God being our helper, we will go to our brother.

He that hath found some fledged bird's nest may know
At first sight if the bird be flown;
But what fair field or grove he sings in now,
That is to him unknown.

And yet as angels, in some brighter dreams,
Call to the soul when man doth sleep,
So some strange thoughts transcend our wonted themes
And into glory peep.

The question being taken on the resolutions submitted by Mr. JONES, of Alabama, they were unanimously adopted; and then, in accordance with the concluding resolution, the House (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

Mr. HAWLEY also presented the petition of Samuel Cupples, president; Charles Claflin Allen, secretary, and 108 others, officers and members of the Civil-Service Reform Association of Missouri, praying for the repeal of the act of May 15, 1820, fixing the tenure of certain administrative offices at four years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PLATT. On the 25th of March last a convention of inventors was held at Cincinnati, Ohio, at which there was a registered attendance of some six hundred persons, and something over 4,000 letters of sympathy and concurrence in the objects of the convention were received. That convention passed certain resolutions which I have been requested to present to the Senate and have read. I ask that the resolutions may be read.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Patents, as follows:

Whereas the incentive and rewards given inventors by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress passed thereunder have done more perhaps than any one cause to advance our whole country to the front rank in wealth, resources, and industries among all nations of the world; and

Whereas any material change in those laws would in the opinion of this association seriously retard our material progress as a people: Therefore,

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in the United States Congress are respectfully requested to oppose the passage of any bill which would have the effect to discourage inventions by impairing the value of patented property or imposing any conditions on the owners of such property in prosecuting and maintaining their rights to the full value of their said property which are not equally applicable under the laws of Congress to the rights of all property and the remedies provided to protect the same for all citizens of our entire country.

Resolved, That the inventors, patent-owners, brain-workers, and citizens of the United States, in convention assembled, where patent interests antagonize no other, but benefit all classes of the community alike, demand the continued protection of our present patent system unimpaired by Congress.

Resolved, That since the money derived from the fees paid by the inventors to the Government is ample to pay all the cost and charges, it is the imperative duty of Congress to provide sufficient force in the Patent Office to do the work well and to keep it up to date, and in all details and particulars to thoroughly equip the Patent Office for its work by providing sufficient accommodations for its force, an ample library of books and publications pertaining to patent and scientific matters, and full and complete digests of inventions in all the classes, and rooms and means to enable the inventor and patentee to search into the novelty of any device or the state of the art in any given direction.

Resolved, That the dignity and importance of the business of the Patent Office demand that it should be severed from the Interior Department and made a department by itself, with a head duly recognized as a member of the Cabinet.

Resolved, That since the matters adjudicated in the Patent Office are in a very large degree legal in their scope and bearing, it is the evident necessity of the case that there should be a distinctly legal bureau or division of this office, clothed with the authority to hear and decide said matters and enforce its decisions.

Resolved, That though there have been nearly 300,000 patents granted, there have been scarce a score of patents which the public has objected to, and no patent based on a wrong which the courts have not finally held invalid.

Resolved, That since under our law the Patent Office must be self-sustaining, and since there are very large requirements to cover the expense of properly equipping the Patent Office for full discharge of its duties, it does not at present seem to be expedient to reduce the Government fees on patents.

Resolved, That protection under the patent system is of more vital importance to us as a nation than the protection of any other industry connected with our Government.

Resolved, That Congress be requested to so modify section 4887 of the United States Statutes that letters patent for the invention of a citizen of the United States shall continue in force for the full term of seventeen years, whether such invention shall or shall not have been previously patented in any foreign country.

Mr. PLATT presented the memorial of Gillespie Brothers, publishers of the Advocate, Stamford, Conn., remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. DAWES. I present the memorial of Mrs. James A. Garfield and 500 other citizens of Cleveland, Ohio. This memorial represents that in 1863 the Government made a treaty with the Nez Percé Indians, who held their reservation under a treaty by which a majority of the Indians surrendered a portion of their reservation, but Chief Joseph and several other chiefs refused to join in that treaty and refused to leave the reservation. They were permitted by the Government to remain upon that reservation without molestation for fourteen years when troops were sent to forcibly drive them out of it, which involved us in a war with Joseph and his band. The memorialists say that Joseph and his band retreated before the United States troops 1,300 miles and then surrendered to General Miles upon a pledge given by General Miles that they should be removed to their brethren in Idaho; but in violation of that pledge the United States removed them first to a prison in Leavenworth, Kans., where they remained a year and a half, and that they were then transported to the Indian Territory to a very unhealthy location, in which half of them have died. There are but about three hundred and fifty of them now left, mostly widows and orphans, and but three children of the whole number that have been born since 1878 have lived to three years of age.

There is a bill pending in the Senate to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to remove such of the remainder of this band back to their old home as in his opinion can safely be done, and these memorialists pray for the passage of that bill. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I present also two petitions for the same purpose, one from Harvey County, Kansas, and the other from Sedgwick County, Kansas. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I present resolutions of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in which they resolve, for the reasons set forth in the resolves, that House bill No. 4483, relative to the revenue-marine service of the United States, commends itself to that Legislature as a just and wise measure, and say they will be glad to see their Senators and Representatives support it. I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four.

Resolution relative to the revenue-marine service of the United States.

Resolved, That the Legislature of Massachusetts is fully impressed with the importance of the revenue marine and the efficient and valuable service it has rendered to the Government and to the ocean, lake, and river commerce of the country, as well as in saving the lives and property of hundreds of those engaged therein; and

Resolved, That as there is no provision of law whereby those who may become disabled by age, injuries, or other cause in said service may be retired, as is the case in the naval and military service of the Government, which in the judgment of this Legislature should be remedied: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Legislature of this Commonwealth that the bill (H. R. 4483) now before Congress, entitled "A bill to promote the efficiency of the revenue-marine service," is one which commends itself to us as a wise and just measure, and one which we would be glad to see the Senators and Representatives from the State support.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 27, 1884.

Adopted. Sent up for concurrence.

EDWARD A. McLAUGHLIN, Clerk.
SENATE, April 1, 1884.

Adopted in concurrence.

He also presented the memorial of J. D. Stine, publisher of the Torchlight, Xenia, Ohio, and the memorial of J. O. Amos, publisher of the Democrat, Sidney, Ohio, remonstrating against the news-copyright bill; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. McMILLAN. I present the petition of the Saint Paul (Minn.) Chamber of Commerce, praying for an increase of the appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, for the harbor of West Saint Paul, for the expenditure of $15,000 heretofore appropriated for the improvement of the river at that point, and for a further appropriation for the same purpose. The petition is accompanied by a map of the locality, which I send up with the petition. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Tacoma, Wash., in favor of the passage of an act making Tacoma a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented the memorial of T. D. Curtis & Sons, of Syracuse, N. Y., and the memorial of the publishers of the Journal, of Port Chester, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of certain Government employés, praying for the enforcement of the eight-hour law, and to pay to employés of the Government wages hitherto withheld, in violation of the eight-hour law; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of 20 citizens of Brookline, Mass., praying for a repeal of the tenure-of-office laws; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. ALDRICH presented the petition of Bishop T. M. Clark, of Rhode Island, and others, members of the Indian Rights Association of Providence, R. I., praying for an appropriation for the education of certain Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WILSON presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

[Joint resolution No. 15.]

Joint resolution and memorial in regard to jurisdiction of United States circuit courts.

Whereas by act of Congress approved September 24, 1789, the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States in suits between citizens of different States was extended to cases in which the amount in controversy exceeded $500; and

Whereas for almost one hundred years the amount thus fixed has remained unchanged, while the commercial and material interests of the country and the business of the courts have increased many fold, and the reasons why so small an amount should determine such jurisdiction no longer exist; and

Whereas corporations organized under the laws of other States, and doing business in the State of Iowa, have systematically removed all cases possible to the United States courts, thus compelling the citizen of this State to pursue his remedy in the United States court, and in many cases amounting to a denial of justice, and causing great inconvenience, unreasonable delay, and unnecessary expense: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby requested to use their influence to procure such a modification and change of existing law, so as to increase the amount determining the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, commensurate with the increase of commercial interests and business of the courts and the demands of the people.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to forward to the President of the Senate of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives a copy of the foregoing resolutions, with the request that the same be laid before each House of Congress, and that a copy be sent to each Senator and member of Congress from this State.

Approved April 3, 1884.

Mr. WILSON presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Joint resolution No. 11.]

Memorial and joint resolution relative to free homes for all surviving soldiers and sailors of the Union Army.

Whereas under the provisions of the homestead laws of Congress it is impossible for many of the soldiers and sailors of the late war to avail themselves of the provisions of said law by reason of ill health caused by injuries and disease received and contracted while in the service of their country and for want of means to locate and improve homesteads as required by law; and

Whereas there is yet belonging to the United States Government enough land to give every soldier and sailor a home without detriment to the public interest: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their utmost endeavors to secure the passage of a law, at this session of Congress, giving to every honorably discharged soldier and sailor of the late war a patent for one hundred and sixty acres of the public land as a home, without requiring them to settle thereon, and that the title thereto be made non-transferable, or with such conditions attached as will secure to the soldier or sailor, or their families, all the benefits of such grant, and debar the speculator from procuring and holding the same for speculative purposes; and, further, that such homesteads be exempt from taxation for ten years, and also be exempt from all debts contracted or incurred by such soldiers and sailors for a like period.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved March 29, 1884.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the original joint resolution on file in this office.

Mr. WILSON presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Joint resolution No. 18.]

Memorial and joint resolution in reference to the applications for pensions.

Whereas thousands of applications for pensions are now pending in the United States Pension Office, and have been pending from two to ten years; and

Whereas many of the applicants gave the best years of their lives, their health, their strength in the defense of their country, and many gave up husband and father; and

Whereas many of them have now no means of support, but have with their families been reduced to abject poverty and want: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That these applications of right ought to be speedily adjusted; that the expectations, hopes, and just rights of those who suffered wounds and disease for their country's good should not longer be delayed.

Resolved, Second. That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use all their influence to secure the most speedy and adequate adjustment practicable of all such claims.

Resolved, Third. That the secretary of state be instructed to furnish a copy of the memorial and joint resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. WILSON presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Joint resolution No. 12.]

A memorial to Congress asking that certain prisoners of the war of the rebellion be placed on the pension-roll.

Whereas many officers, soldiers, and sailors of the Federal Army and Navy were confined in so-called confederate prisons for an unusual length of time, suffering great hardships and contracting disease hard and difficult to prove under existing pension laws; and

Whereas Hon. JAMES S. ROBINSON, of Ohio, has introduced in the Forty-eighth Congress a bill (No. 1189) "granting pensions to all soldiers, sailors, and marines who, while in the service of the United States, and while in the line of their duty, were taken prisoners, and as such confined in the so-called confederate prisons, between the 1st day of May, 1861, and the 1st day of May, 1865, as follows: "All who were prisoners of war two months, and less than six months, one-half pensions; those who were prisoners of war six months, and less than twelve months, a three-fourths pension; and all such as were prisoners of war twelve months, and more than twelve months, a total pension. And, furthermore, such surviving prisoners of war shall receive $2 per day for each day and every day's confinement in said confederate military prisons: Provided, That such pension shall in each case begin from the date of the passage of this act, and shall be paid at the same time and in the same manner as other pensions are now paid: And provided further, That this act shall not entitle any person to draw more than one pension, but that such survivors of the so-called confederate military prisons as are entitled and are receiving a pension at the time of the passage of this act shall be entitled to the increase of their pension which this act may grant them:" Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Representatives in Congress be requested, and Senators therein instructed, to use their best endeavors to secure the passage of an act by Congress in accordance with the provisions of said Robinson bill, No. 1189.

Approved March 29, 1884.

He also presented a memorial and resolutions of the Board of Trade of Burlington, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of several bills pending in Congress relative to the patent system and laws of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. FARLEY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as follows:

Assembly concurrent resolution, No. 1, relative to the postal-telegraph bill introduced in Congress by Hon. Charles A. Sumner.

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That we heartily indorse the postal-telegraph bill introduced in Congress by Hon. Charles A. Sumner, of this State, believing it to be an eminently wise and practical measure, and one imperatively demanded by the interests of the people of the United States.

Resolved, That our Senators be, and they are hereby, instructed, and our Representatives requested, to support and by all honorable means endeavor to secure the passage of said bill.

He also presented a resolution of the New York Cotton Exchange, in favor of the stoppage of the further coinage of the silver dollar until some readjustment of the relative values of gold and silver coins may be accomplished; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hold in my hand a memorial, numerously signed by gentlemen and firms engaged in the tobacco business, remonstrating against the agitation looking to a repeal of the tax now imposed upon their business. They are content as the tax stands, and say that any agitation of the question of the tax demoralizes their trade and very seriously affects their business, and that during such agitation sales are hindered and parties wait, hoping always for more than is realized, thus virtually stopping their business for the time, which is never regained. The memorialists further represent that the tax is now so light that it is not felt by the trade, while it aggregates to the Government a large sum in liquidating the national debt, which all good citizens desire paid at the earliest possible day. They do not think a debt by the Government any more a blessing than an individual debt; and they therefore pray, in the interest of trade and that of the Government, that the tax may rest as it is until the Government shall need no further internal taxes in paying off the national debt.

I heartily indorse the sentiments of the memorial, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance, and I hope that that committee will adopt the same.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER presented the memorial of W. J. Oliver and other citizens of South Carolina, remonstrating against the passage of a news-copyright bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of members of Fort Donelson Post, No. 256, Grand Army of the Republic, Saint Mary's, Kans., praying for the passage of laws in accordance with the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Ottawa, Kans., in favor of the passage of the bill granting to the Southern Kansas Railway Company the right of way through the Indian Territory; which were ordered to lie on the table

Mr. PLUMB. I present a memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Albuquerque, N. Mex., in regard to certain occurrences which have recently taken place in that Territory; and I will venture to ask unanimous consent that it may be read at length. It is upon a very important subject and presents somewhat at length, but tersely, the matters of difference in that Territory.

The memorial was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists, the officers and members of the Board of Trade of the city of Albuquerque, in the Territory of New Mexico, on behalf of themselves and all the people of said city, would respectfully represent:

First. That an act of Congress authorized the holding of a session of the Territorial Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, to be begun on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1884.

Second. That on the day above mentioned the two houses of the Territorial Legislature aforesaid were organized amid much confusion, and in a manner which a very large and intelligent portion of the people of the Territory did then and do now regard as irregular, improper, and illegal.

Third. That on account of said alleged irregularity and illegality in the organization of the bodies assuming to be the Legislature of the Territory, certain men holding uncontested rights to seats in the council did refuse, and have ever since refused, to qualify and take their seats in that body.

Fourth. That the council is and has from the first been composed of less than a majority of those who hold certificates of election from the lawful authorities as legally elected members of that body, together with two persons who did not possess or present any evidence of their right to seats, but were admitted by the arbitrary act of the Secretary of the Territory, and whose rights to seats in that body were never investigated or passed upon by the council.

Fifth. Under the ruling that it does not require a majority of all the members of the body to pass an act, but only a majority of those present, the votes of four persons are sufficient to pass bills in the council as at present organized, and two of these may be persons who hold no certificates of election, whose competitors were returned as elected and whose rights to seats have never been examined or passed upon by the body in which they are acting, thus making it possible for any two of those who were returned as members to pass bills, make appropriations, and do all other acts which should be done only by a majority of all the members of the council.

Sixth. That the Legislature as thus constituted has passed divers and sundry acts which in their character are inimical to the public interest, and which, as your memorialists firmly believe, were passed for the purpose of promoting the personal aggrandizement of certain individuals at the expense of the public good, and the effect of which would be to subject the people of the Territory to unwise and unjust laws, to put upon them, contrary to their will as expressed in their petitions and protests, unnecessary and onerous burdens of taxation which the business interests of the Territory are unable to bear, and to bring upon the people of the Territory great hardship in their persons and property.

Seventh. That it has made lavish and unreasonable appropriations for unnecessary and improper purposes, and has provided for the issuing of bonds therefor, which would place upon the people of New Mexico a burden of public debt greater than has ever heretofore been contracted by any Territory of the United States, and greater than the taxable property of the Territory can bear.

Eighth. That it has provided for the creation of debts which, with the interest upon the same, would equal 5 per cent. of all the tax-paying property in the Territory, and has provided for the commencement of costly and unnecessary public buildings which will require the appropriation of much larger sums for their completion by other Legislatures in the future.

Ninth. That a very large proportion of all the best property of the Territory is held by religious organizations and used for purposes of business, such as orchards, gardens, and vineyards, and that the body assuming to be the Legislature has passed an act exempting all this from taxation.

Tenth. That it has passed a so-called public-school law, which is unjust and anti-American in its provisions, which places the public-school fund of the Territory virtually at the disposal of the church, which makes the schools that are supported by public taxation essentially sectarian in character, contrary to the genius of American institutions and at variance with the progressive educational spirit of the age.

Eleventh. That its course has been mainly governed by what was undoubtedly a deliberate plan to further the interests of a few individuals at the expense of the public treasury and the public weal, and, in order to carry through its unjust and corrupt plans, has promised favors to those individuals and those communities that have supported it and has endeavored to punish by unfriendly legislation those that have opposed it.

Twelfth. That two of the most populous and important cities of the Territory, Las Vegas and Socorro, because their people took an active part in opposition to certain acts of injustice and extravagance, have been "punished" by the passage of laws disincorporating them, against the protest of nearly all their citizens, and they are thus left in a state of confusion and without any form of local government.

Thirteenth. That it has levied a duty upon all graded or thoroughbred cattle coming into the Territory, thus laying a burden upon an industry that ought to be protected and encouraged, striking a blow at one of the most important interests of the Territory and violating the provision of the Constitution of the United States which guarantees unrestricted commerce between the States.

Fourteenth. That it has ordered the erection of costly buildings for a capitol and Territorial penitentiary, which works, if necessary, should be constructed by the United States, and has provided for the payment therefor by the issuing of large amounts of bonds, to pay the interest and principal of which will render necessary a burden of taxation which the property of the Territory is not able to bear, and which must inevitably lead the Territory into financial distress and repudiation.

Fifteenth. That it has passed an act ratifying the action of the commissioners of San Miguel County, who through improper influences have entered into a contract for the building of a court-house at an expense of $125,000, in defiance of the protests of the tax-payers of the county, who assert that $40,000 at the utmost for such a building is as much as the property of the county can bear.

Sixteenth. That it has passed divers and sundry other acts making extravagant and unnecessary appropriations of public money and authorizing the reckless expenditure of the public funds, all of which combined will place upon the tax-payers of the Territory a burden greater than they can bear, and greater than has ever been assumed by any other Territory of the United States.

Seventeenth. That the credit of the Territory is already seriously impaired, its obligations selling for not more than 80 cents on the dollar, and the enormous debts which have been authorized by this Legislature must inevitably render its paper comparatively valueless, or render necessary a rate of taxation which the property of the Territory can not bear, which would seriously retard development and check the growth of our most important industries.

Eighteenth. That it has acted in all things in utter disregard of the petitions and supplications of the people, and has left no escape from the conclusion that its action has been governed by corrupt motives and by a desire to enrich a few individuals at the expense of the public.

Nineteenth. That, despite the enormous percentage of illiteracy in New Mexico (which is far greater than in any other division of the United States), it has failed to establish an American public-school system; though it has levied a generous school tax, it has so provided for the management and disposal of the fund as to turn it all into the control and for the benefit of the church, and though it has made lavish appropriations from the public treasury for the benefit of church institutions, it has failed to provide for the appropriation of a dollar for the building of school-houses.

Twentieth. That it has been so far engrossed in serving the personal ends of a few individuals that if has ignored and neglected all the important public interests of the Territory.

Twenty-first. That for the foregoing and many other reasons of like character that might be enumerated for the purpose of rescuing the Territory from an insupportable burden of unnecessary indebtedness; for the purpose of protecting our property and business interests from the outrages with which they are threatened, and for the purpose of saving the people of the Territory from the evil consequences of legislation which is corrupt in its nature and anti-republican in its character, your memorialists would respectfully ask that each and all of the acts of the body which assumed to be the Twenty-sixth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico may be annulled and set aside.

The above memorial being presented at a meeting of the Albuquerque Board of Trade, held on April 5, 1884, was on motion unanimously adopted.

W. K. P. WILSON, First Vice-President.
CHAS. ETHERIDGE, Secretary pro tempore.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That reference will be made.

Mr. CONGER. I ask to have the names of the signers to that paper read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the names attached to the paper.

The CHIEF CLERK. "W. K. P. Wilson, first vice-president; Charles Etheridge, secretary pro tempore."

Mr. CONGER. Of what?

The CHIEF CLERK. "Your memorialists, the officers and members of the Board of Trade of the city of Albuquerque, in the Territory of New Mexico, on behalf of themselves and all the people of said city, would respectfully represent."

Mr. CONGER. Has it been referred?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the recommendation of the grand jury of the United States district court of Delaware respecting certain public buildings in Wilmington, Del., to accompany the report made by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on the bill (S. 1885) for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, Del. It is a mere recommendation that an appropriation for public buildings in that town should be made.

The paper was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The undersigned, grand jurymen for the United States court for the district of Delaware at its session this 9th day of April, A. D. 1884, would most respectfully represent that,

Whereas the United States court-rooms in the city of Wilmington are totally unfit and inadequate for the business of said court: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be most respectfully but earnestly requested to secure an appropriation for the purpose of a building suitable for the uses of said court.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them adversely; and they were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 1707) to establish a court of appeals, and to provide additional circuit court judges;

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SLATER introduced a bill (S. 2036) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SLATER. I ask that the bill may lie on the table, and I give notice that on Thursday next, at 2 o'clock, I shall seek to call it up for the purpose of submitting some remarks on the subject of land grants and their management and forfeiture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will lie on the table subject to the call of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 2037) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of adulterated and spurious teas," approved March 2, 1883; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2038) authorizing the President to appoint and retire John C. Frémont as a major-general in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (S. 2039) to authorize the issue of duplicate certificates, bonds, or other evidences of debt against the District of Columbia in cases of loss or destruction; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GROOME introduced a bill (S. 2040) for the relief of Capt. Andrew W. Johnson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 2041) granting the right of way to the city of Newport, R. I., over the breakwater at Goat Island; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 2042) to protect American laborers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the letter of Joseph Neumann, presenting to the Senate a flag made from California silk, be taken from the files, and referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

CALIFORNIA EAST BOUNDARY LINE.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas it is alleged by citizens of the counties of El Dorado, Alpine, and Mono, in the State of California, that an error was made by Alexey Von Schmidt in the survey of the east boundary line of the State of California, whereby a strip of territory belonging to said State about a mile in width extending through said counties has been attached to the State of Nevada:

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to make investigation of said survey and report his findings to the Senate, with his recommendation of such action as he may deem necessary in the premises for the restoration to California of any territory which may have been taken from said State by mistake or otherwise.

SURPLUS DEPOSIT WITH THE STATES.

Mr. GARLAND submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire whether the Secretary of the Treasury should not be authorized and directed to carry out the provisions of the thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the act of Congress approved June 23, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," by making the deposit of the fourth installment which was postponed by the act of Congress of October 2, 1837, entitled "An act to postpone the fourth installment of deposit with the States," with such of the States then entitled thereto and which have not received the same out of the present existing surplus revenue not otherwise appropriated in the manner provided by said act of 1836, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table. I shall call it up in a day or two for the purpose of making an explanation of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1084) granting a pension to Dorathea Bothner;

A bill (H. R. 2017) granting a pension to Walter Dickson;

A bill (H. R. 3331) for the relief of Ann McCarney;

A bill (H. R. 4439) granting a pension to John R. Wallace; and

A bill (H. R. 5457) granting a pension to Allicia Durrant.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1871) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to offer a reward of $25,000 for rescuing or ascertaining the fate of the Greely expedition; and

A bill (S. 1272) for the relief of Millie E. Hays, widow of John Hays, deceased.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (S. 431) for the relief of Sallie A. Spence; and

A bill (S. 874) to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, title 72, in relation to guano islands.

DEATH OF HON. THOMAS H. HERNDON.

The message further communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. THOMAS H. HERNDON, late a Representative-elect to the House from the State of Alabama, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. PUGH. I ask that the resolutions may lie on the table, on account of the absence of Senators who desire to make remarks upon the resolutions. I give notice that I shall not call them up for action by the Senate until 4 o'clock on Friday next.

ROCKPORT A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration at the present time a bill which will require no debate. It is merely to correct an error in the Revised Statutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question, the Chair would state, is to proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. Pending that motion I ask unanimous consent to consider this bill.

Mr. HALE. If it will take no time I shall yield.

Mr. HOAR. It will take no time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read by title for information.

Mr. HOAR. Let the Secretary read the entire bill for information. It contains but three lines.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3956) to amend section 2527 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the district of Gloucester.

Be it enacted, &c., That the second clause of section 2527 of the Revised Statutes, describing the district of Gloucester, is hereby amended by making the town of Rockport a port of delivery therein.

Mr. HOAR. The town of Rockport has been set off from Gloucester. It has been a port of delivery for many years as a part of Gloucester. When the statutes were revised the statement was accidentally omitted that it should be a port of delivery, leaving the old town only. It has been treated as a port of delivery ever since, as I am told, and the mistake has just been discovered. The bill has passed the House and is reported unanimously by the Committee on Commerce.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the Senator if this is the same bill in substance as the one reported by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. It is; it is the identical bill.

Mr. CONGER. The House bill?

Mr. HOAR. The House bill. They have not changed it as they have reported it.

The bill was passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations appearing between lines 383 and 476 of the printed bill. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. BAYARD. What is the question? Is it on the amendment for the new cruisers?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment comprised between lines 383 and 476 of the printed bill.

Mr. HALE. The amendment was read in full on the last day the Senate was in session. I will state to Senators that it covers the bill for the new cruisers.

Mr. BAYARD. That is, the main amendment for the seven cruisers?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I have but a word to say about that, Mr. President. This amendment is in substance and form a measure that was passed by the Senate at the present session, and because it was passed by the Senate at the present session it may, as appears by the sixteenth rule, be ingrafted as an amendment upon an appropriation bill.

I understood the President pro tempore of the Senate to rule that upon other grounds this measure would be considered not only germane but proper as an amendment to an appropriation bill. In his view upon that subject I do not concur, but as he has made the decision I take no appeal from it.

Although the sixteenth rule permits the amendment to be in order, yet I do not think it expedient or right that it should be placed upon this bill. The Senate has done its duty, and by a majority vote, in which I joined, it has signified its approval of the proposition to build a new American navy, and as an installment of that navy to create seven additional cruisers, not of great strength or warlike power but of considerable swiftness, that they may act as adjuncts to American commerce and protect American commerce.

There was a most odious appellation given to these vessels, one that grated on my ears, calling them "commerce-destroyers." I hope they never will have occasion to be used as commerce destroyers. It may be the unpleasant function and duty of the American Navy to cripple the commerce of a hostile nation, but I had rather vote for this measure with the view that American commerce needs protection and assistance in foreign ports, as I believe the American people now are awakening to the fact that our manufacturers and producers are to have other markets than our home market, and to that end that the unwholesome ligatures shall be loosed which excessive tariff rates have tied up our markets with and have so increased the cost of production that our manufacturers and producers can not find foreign markets for their commodities; but that there is to be greater commercial freedom for the people of the United States than for the last twenty years they have been allowed to enjoy. Looking upon the building of these seven vessels, together with the four that were authorized previously, as a proper, seasonable, and reasonable step toward the end in view, I voted for the bill as a separate measure.

I expect if the opportunity be given me to vote for a reduction in prohibitory duties now imposed by law in order that the cost of production, of manufacture in the United States may be lessened and the people of the United States may have access to other than their home market. That is, I say, one of the most desirable features to be contemplated by this increase of the American Navy. I need not refer to other services that these vessels can perform in the immediate present and possibly in the future. Hydrographic surveys have been neglected in the last twenty years. These vessels can assist in making them possibly. There is to-day a great field of employment for the officers of the American Navy which they are not sent upon; and in that I include hydrographic surveys upon the high seas. We have contributed little or nothing to that process of enlightenment and aid in the world's commerce. There was a time a few years back when one American by his own ability, his genius as a geographer, and his labor in office, bestowed incalculable wealth upon the entire commercial world. I refer to Capt. M. F. Maury, lately in charge of the Observatory in this city. His charts, his sailing directions, his geography of the sea, brought not only honor to himself and his country, but the most important benefits upon the entire commercial world. With that service by him, it seems to me that the American aid to general commerce almost ended.

Now, sir, I desire to see it restored. I believe these seven ships will assist in restoring it. I look upon them, I say, as an adjunct to a commerce which I hope to see expanded and which I believe the wisdom of the American people is bound to produce that they no longer intend to be tied up in their home market, under which labor is compelled to unpaid idleness for many months in the year simply because when the home market is supplied there is no possible outlet for the remainder.

But, Mr. President, while I have signified my willingness for this Navy, while I have spoken and voted in favor of the creation of this Navy, despite very unpleasant obstacles to the expenditure of money at this time (which I do not care again to refer to and only did refer to in the course of the line of my duty), still I do not see why this measure is repeated a second time at the same session by the same branch of Congress, and I do object to its being placed upon an appropriation bill. It is the beginning of a practice which has always been condemned in the Senate and even when it has been assented to it has been with constant expressions of protest; and that is the ingrafting of general legislation or new legislation upon bills that ex vi termini were intended only to supply money to carry out existing laws.

Why, sir, there are features further proposed to this bill in the shape of amendments offered by the honorable Senator from Maine in respect of providing $1,800,000 plant for a gun-factory and providing also for the purchase or erection of plant for castings, forgings, and tempering guns of a large caliber—expressions very wise in themselves, but which are just as plainly new legislation as words can define.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator allow me a suggestion?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to have a clear idea on this subject. I can not for the life of me see wherein this can be said to be independent or new legislation. I have again and again voted for appropriation bills coming from the House that had on them legislation repealing laws and changing laws, and there was no question about it. But here the Naval Committee reported a bill authorizing the construction of these seven ships. In the regular course, I take it, that bill should have gone to the Appropriations Committee and then come to the Senate; but before going to the Appropriations Committee it was passed through the Senate. The Naval Committee passed on the question of the construction of the cruisers in regular course, and it ought to have gone from there to the Appropriations Committee and let that committee have provided for the money necessary to construct them. This is in substantial compliance with that usage; and the authority that has been given by the Senate to the bill of the Naval Committee may stand as a reference to the Appropriations Committee. That is the way I look at it.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the Senator from Florida is in error. I submit to him very respectfully that he is wrong as to the practice of the Senate on this subject, or the order of business. It was perfectly competent for the appropriate committee, that is to say the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, to bring in a proposition to increase the Navy, and in the same bill to provide for paying for that increase; and that was precisely what they did. They did it in due and regular form. There was no objection from any source as to the method of presenting the measure, and the discussion that took place was entirely as to its merits. So I think my friend from Florida is in error in supposing that this roundabout process should be resorted to and that the Naval Committee should report a bill to build a navy and then send it to the Appropriations Committee to learn the cost of the proposed navy and to provide an appropriation to cover it. That has not been the custom; that is not the rule of the Senate.

The Naval Committee proceeded precisely as they ought to have done. They made up their minds that the Navy needed reconstruction and replacement. They did produce a bill to that effect, and they said that they needed so many vessels and they needed so much money to build them, and the Senate passed that bill and it has gone to the House of Representatives. That was all regular and I voted for it; I sustained it. But now the proposition is to pass the same measure over again as an amendment ingrafted on an appropriation bill sent here from the House.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. What is the force of that rule which the Senator has referred to which provides that a bill which has already passed the Senate may be incorporated in an appropriation bill, unless it is intended to cover just such a case as this? What force will the Senator give to that rule if it does not include the case that is now before the Senate?

Mr. BAYARD. Here is an exception to the denial of the right of amendment upon an appropriation bill, unless the amendment proposed has received the approval of the Senate at the same session. Of course the necessary implication is that you may ingraft upon an appropriation bill a measure that has received the approval of the Senate at the same session.

Mr. HALE. It says so in terms, does it not?

Mr. BAYARD. I say that the rule permits it.

Mr. HALE. In terms?

Mr. BAYARD. I say that the rule permits it in terms. I can construe the words as having no other meaning. But because the rule permits it, that does not make it in my judgment a proper form of legislation.

Mr. HALE. Certainly it must remove any impression that there is a desire to unduly force the other body, because our rules which the Senate have adopted and which conclude the Senator as well as me do provide this very thing.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Maine has perfectly satisfied me that he has no intention of forcing the other House. I was very glad to have the statement made by him because I do not like suggestions of coercion or force. They are out of the question. A man here in either body ought not to be coerced except by his own sense of duty; and to such coercion he ought to yield and to no other coercion. Therefore I accept fully what my friend from Maine says—that this is simply a method of bringing the subject a second time and more directly before the attention of the House in order to procure their answer yes or no in regard to it. I do not know that I particularly object to getting their opinion upon the subject, but they certainly have the opportunity to vote on that bill now. We can not compel them to agree to these new cruisers, and I do not know that we can compel them to consider the subject.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to present to the Senator from Maine what I conceive to be the meaning of the rule in answer to the question he propounded to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BAYARD. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senate having passed a bill which if it become a law will involve the necessity of the expenditure of money, it is then competent for the Senate to incorporate in an appropriation bill the appropriation, but not the legislation—the appropriation which may become necessary if this bill that the Senate has passed at this session shall pass the other House and become a law. If the appropriation be made, however, and no law shall be passed authorizing the building of the cruisers the appropriation would fail. It would not be used for the purpose for want of an object. That is what I conceive to be the meaning of the rule.

Mr. HALE. I will not controvert with the Senator from Tennessee about the meaning of this rule and what it comprehends. Taking the view of the Senator from Delaware as to what this rule does comprehend, and his statement made the other day that it embraced this amendment—starting upon that as my hypothesis, the ground for acting, I was seeking to bring out from the Senator from Delaware that if it did not cover this it did not cover anything. I have no controversy with the Senator from Tennessee about the rule myself. That is another thing.

Mr. HARRIS. My suggestion was in respect to the point made by the Senator from Delaware. I beg, if the Senator from Delaware will permit me, to say this: If you incorporate into this appropriation bill the legislation that makes the appropriation necessary, which gives the authority to expend the money as well as to appropriate it, you do put the Senate in an attitude under which the conferees on the part of the Senate may say to the conferees on the part of the House, "These necessary appropriations shall not be made unless you consent to that legislation;" whereas, if you had confined yourselves to putting simply the appropriation made necessary by the bill passed by the Senate in this bill without the legislation, the House could very well have afforded to make the appropriation, leaving its ultimate expenditure upon the passage of the Senate bill which authorized it. I beg pardon of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HALE. The answer to that, if the Senator will allow me, is that it has already been ruled and is now the law of the body upon which we are proceeding, that the amendment submitted by the Committee on Appropriations is not general legislation, that it is simply an appropriation of money to be used in the building up and augmenting of a department of the Government already provided for by law.

Mr. BAYARD. Allow me to ask the Senator from Maine a question. There is no doubt, I believe, that the bill which passed the Senate did appropriate the money to build these vessels. The bill that we voted for last February, or whenever it was during this session, appropriated the money to carry on the work?

Mr. HALE. The original bill; oh, yes.

Mr. BAYARD. Therefore the bill was complete, authorizing the construction of the vessels and providing the money to construct them. Was not that so?

Mr. HALE. Complete if it passes both Houses.

Mr. BAYARD. I am speaking so far as the Senate is concerned. That is so.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BAYARD. Now, the language of the rule is in accord with the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee. In the first place it provides:

> 1. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session.

Unless it be made to carry out the provisions of the bill which passed the Senate and which, as the Senator said, provided for the construction of a navy and appropriated the money to build the ships. Now, what do you mean by declaring that your amendment shall be in order if it is to carry out the provisions of a bill heretofore passed at this session? It is not certainly to re-enact authority to build the ships, but it is on an appropriation bill to carry out the provision to build those ships. Is not that the meaning of the rule? Here are words in accordance with the interpretation given by the Senator from Tennessee where the exception is made to the inhibition of amendments upon general appropriation bills in the case of an "act or resolution previously passed by the Senate," which need to have their provisions carried out. Of course if their provisions are to be carried out on appropriation bills, it is by the appropriation of money. This does more than that.

Mr. HALE. I was proceeding, and have been all the while, on the basis of the statement that the Senator himself made on Thursday, that under this rule he believed this amendment to be in order. That is the basis of all I have said. The Senator from Tennessee does not agree with that. He does not think that this is in order under the rule. That raises another question entirely. But on the basis of the statement of the Senator from Delaware, that the rule which he has read does make this amendment in order, then I can not see how he can have any hesitation about putting it onto this bill.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Maine, I know, is disposed to deal very candidly with the question unembarrassed by the forms of legislation and to assist in presenting it fairly. I am disposed to think that my assent was given too broadly on Thursday to that ruling under the language as to ingrafting any act or resolution on an appropriation bill because it has passed the Senate at the same session. It is simply to carry out the provisions of such an act. Now, what were those provisions? What do you mean by carrying out the provisions of an act in an appropriation bill? Is it not, I submit fairly, to furnish the money to carry them out? I submit to the Senator from Maine if that is not a satisfactory interpretation of the rule to him? That is, you are to carry out the provisions of the act, which is a very different thing from authorizing the ingrafting of any act or resolution upon an appropriation bill?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I understand the Senator to say that if this were a provision making an appropriation to carry out the provisions of a bill which had passed the Senate heretofore during this session it would be in order. Now, would it not be necessary to describe what the appropriation was designed to carry out? And has there been anything more than that done in the amendment to which he takes exception?

Mr. BAYARD. Now, I ask the attention of the Senator from Maine, because that is the very point between us. Suppose the Senate had passed a bill authorizing the construction of the seven additional men-of-war, and had made no provision for payment, and that bill had passed to the House; now, it seems to me that under this rule it would have been proper, in order to carry out the provisions of that bill which passed the Senate, that we should by an amendment find the money to carry these provisions into effect. In this case, however, we have not only passed a bill authorizing the construction of the seven cruisers but we have passed a bill authorizing the expenditure of the money to pay for them. Now, it is proposed in this appropriation bill not to put on an amendment providing money to pay for these seven cruisers, but an amendment regulating the entire matter and appropriating anew upon an appropriation bill and providing new legislation of a similar character which independently we have passed and sent to the House as a separate measure.

I must say that upon reflection I am compelled to restrict my view as to the order or disorder of this amendment to this last statement which I have made, and that considering the nature of the bill with which we are dealing, which is a bill appropriating money to carry into effect existing laws, it is made competent by this rule of the Senate to ingraft upon that bill an amendment to carry out the provisions of another act which we have passed at the same session; that is to say, to make appropriations to carry into effect the provisions of that act; but I do not believe under this rule that because a bill making appropriations was coupled with a distinct and new measure you can take that entire bill and ingraft it on an appropriation bill. It is to that extent that I am disposed to restrict the construction which I assented to last Thursday or some time last week, and which has been quoted by the Senator from Maine.

But, Mr. President, if it were in order by the rule (which I am disposed now, as I say, to restrict) to ingraft a totally new and independent measure on this appropriation bill, I do not think it would be right to do so. It is not a form of legislation that I would recommend or that I am here to sustain. We can do no better than present our measures articulately, so that they may be precisely understood and stand or fall on their own merits. That is good in every contract or proposition in life: that a man should make himself understood so that he may be answered yes or no to what he is asking for and asking in the right way. The forms of law all tend to that, and the forms of legislation all tend to that or ought to, and that is to distinctness and articulateness of demand.

In this case the Senate has plainly and distinctly asked the House to concur with them in building these seven new vessels. They have accompanied that already by giving their consent and aid to finding the money from the Treasury to build the vessels. That is complete. Everybody understands it. But is it wise or right upon an appropriation bill to couple not merely the provision of money to carry out this measure which we passed at the present session, but to repeat the measure itself by ingrafting it upon an appropriation bill? It is not right; it is not wise; and I do not hold upon examination that it was intended by this rule to allow it.

I have heard in the Senate over and over again the most obvious and most just criticism upon the legislative vice of ingrafting general legislation upon an appropriation bill. Each measure ought to stand or fall on its own merits; and if you mix it up with appropriations for a variety of subjects you may endanger the appropriations, or you may secure the appropriations by carrying a very doubtful measure with them. That is not a wise form of legislation. Omnibus bills have been prevented by the constitutions of several of the States. My impression is that the State of Pennsylvania objects to and prevents two variant measures from being joined in the same bill. It is the objection to the omnibus bill that we call a river and harbor bill that it contains an infinite variety of measures, some good and others bad. In this case I do not think a man who wishes to vote supplies for the Navy ought to be compelled to vote for or against a bill to build these new ships with it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine the object of placing this legislation upon the appropriation bill. It has been denied here that there was any coercion in it, that any coercion was contemplated. What is it if it be not coercion? If it is not placed here with the intention of coercing the House of Representatives to pass this amendment, why is it affixed to a bill containing other matters for which appropriations must be made? The Senate has already passed a bill of like character, one which the honorable Senator himself declares to be an exact transcript of what is here proposed; it is now in the possession of the House, and if they desire to act upon it, if it is deemed of sufficient importance by them to pass, it can be taken up and acted upon at any time.

Now, what is the necessity and where is the necessity of putting this legislation upon an appropriation bill if it be not to say to the House of Representatives, "The Senate has twice passed judgment upon this measure: first, in an original proposition, in a bill standing alone by itself; and secondly, the same bill affixed to an appropriation bill." The judgment of the Senate having been expressed twice, when the committees of conference of the two Houses meet together the Senate conferees can quite properly and quite justly say, "The Senate has twice expressed its judgment on this legislation; we deny your right to refuse it; we insist upon it, and mean to remain here till you do give us the legislation demanded on this appropriation bill."

I submit, Mr. President, that under the rule itself it has no place upon this bill. In right and justice to the other branch of Congress it has no right here, and there is no necessity for it whatever, even in the estimation of those who have voted for it, because a like appropriation is contained and the manner of its expenditure is also set forth in the bill already passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BAYARD. I would rather record my judgment upon this matter. The rule provides:

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto; and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate.

I should like to have a vote of the Senate on the relevancy of the amendment now proposed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. When the amendment was offered the other day, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] distinctly raised the question of order, which was passed upon by the Chair at that time, and no appeal was taken. So it seems to me that the question of order has already been decided.

Mr. BAYARD. But if the Senator will read Rule XVI he will find that although the President of the Senate decided and no appeal was taken and no demand was made for it to be submitted to the Senate, yet the language of the rule at the end of clause 3 is this:

> And all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate; and any amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill.
